To my father Manuel Pérez García who has set an outstanding example of perseverance, dedication, love, and passion to his work in the medical profession. His altruistic and generous service to the care of the community deserves full recognition, being an example to follow for the education and direction of the family. Without your support and your example of commitment and enthusiasm to your work, I would never have been able to write this book.

The family is the stronghold to keep the values, ethics and unity of our society.

Series Editors' Foreword

Over recent decades the traditional 'languages and literatures' model in Spanish departments in universities in the United Kingdom has been superseded by a contextual, interdisciplinary and 'area studies' approach to the study of the culture, history, society and politics of the Hispanic and Lusophone worlds – categories that extend far beyond the confines of the Iberian Peninsula, not only in Latin America but also to Spanish-speaking and Lusophone Africa.

In response to these dynamic trends in research priorities and curriculum development, this series is designed to present both disciplinary and interdisciplinary research within the general field of Iberian and Latin American Studies, particularly studies that explore all aspects of Cultural Production (inter alia literature, film, music, dance, sport) in Spanish, Portuguese, Basque, Catalan, Galician and indigenous languages of Latin America. The series also aims to publish research in the History and Politics of the Hispanic and Lusophone worlds, at the level of both the region and the nation-state, as well as on Cultural Studies that explore the shifting terrains of gender, sexual, racial and postcolonial identities in those same regions.

This book is the result of the academic actions and activities of the GECEM (Global Encounters between China and Europe: Trade Networks, Consumption and Cultural Exchanges in Macau and Marseille, 1680–1840, www.gecem.eu) Project. The workshops and academic forums in which I have participated since GECEM started in June 2016, in Tokyo, Beijing, Boston, Shanghai, Oxford, Paris, Vancouver, Seville, Mexico City, Guadalajara, San José (Costa Rica) and Murcia have served to obtain feedback from outstanding scholars and improve upon the ideas and early drafts of this book.

I wish to acknowledge the financial support of the European Research Council (ERC)-Starting Grant, under the European Union's Horizon 2020 Research and Innovation Programme, at the Pablo de Olavide University (UPO) in Seville (Spain), which acts as European host for GECEM. The academic collaboration with my colleague and friend Professor Lucio de Sousa (Tokyo University of Foreign Studies) has helped and encouraged me to undertake my career as a historian in China and in the 2011 founding of the Global History Network in China (GHN) in Beijing, www.globalhistorynetwork.com.

We have jointly established a permanent academic forum of discussion and publications through GHN to promote knowledge and understanding of the still unknown East Asian world and culture, and the exchanges with Europe and the Western world. Expanding the GHN through organised academic meetings in China, Europe, and the Americas has helped us to invigorate the field of global history and early modern history of western and eastern regions. Obtaining my current European Research Council (ERC)-Starting Grant in the autumn of 2015 has made it possible to further this mission, which has crystallised in the publication of this book by the University of Wales Press.

I am grateful to academic institutions and partners of GECM and GHN such as Shanghai Jiao Tong University, Tokyo University of Foreign Studies, the Beijing Center for Chinese Studies at the University of International Business and Economics (Beijing, China), the Macau Ricci Institute at the University of Saint Joseph (Macau), the Faculty of Asian and Middle Eastern Studies at the University of Cambridge, the Centre for Global History at the University of Oxford, the Center of Global History and European Studies at Pittsburgh University, the Centre of Global History at the University of Warwick, the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM), the École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales (Paris, France), the European University Institute (Florence, Italy), the Universidad Autónoma de Madrid, and the Faculty of Economics and Business at the Universidad de Murcia.

I specially want to thank GECM Project team members Bartolomé Yun-Casalilla, Marisol Vidales Bernal, Omar Svriz, Manuel Díaz Ordoñez, Nadia Fernández de Pinedo Echeverría, María Jesús Milán Agudo, Rocío Moreno Cabanillas, Felix Muñoz, Jin Lei, Wang Li and Guimel Hernández. I am grateful to comments and suggestions made by Jack Owens, Jesus Cruz, Jean-Pierre Dedieu, Mafalda Soares da Cunha, Luis Jauregui, Richard von Glahn, Bartolomé Yun-Casalilla, Anne McCants, Shigeru Akita, Gakusho Nakajima, Mihoko Oka, Carlos Marichal, Dennis Flynn, Patrick O'Brien, Pat Manning, Joe P. McDermott, Leonard Blusse, François Gipouloux, Debin Ma, Leonor Díaz de Seabra and Antonio Ibarra. I would also like to thank the PAIDI group HUM-1000 Historia de la Globalización: Violencia, Negociación e Interculturalidad at Area de Historia Moderna (UPO), of which I am a member. The Principal Investigator of the PAIDI group is Igor Pérez Tostado, funded by Junta de Andalucía (Seville, Spain). Igor Pérez, Bethany Aram and Fernando Ramos deserve a special word of gratitude for their support and help. I also express my gratitude to the Project HAR2014-53797-P Globalización Ibérica: redes entre Asia y Europa y los cambios en las pautas de consumo en Latinoamérica whose Principal Investigator is Bartolomé Yun-Casalilla, funded by the Ministerio de Economía y Competitividad (MINECO). I am also a research member of this project.

Special mention should be made of Professor Manuel Barcia (Chair of Global History at the University of Leeds) for his support with this book. Also, a special word of thanks to Sarah Lewis, head of commissioning at the University of Wales Press, for believing in this project. I am thankful for the assistance of Paula de la Cruz-Fernández and Elisabeth O’Kane Lipartito (from the translation and editing group Edita.us) in the proofreading, translating and reviewing of this manuscript.

My wife Marisol Vidales Bernal needs a very special word of thanks as she played a key role in developing my work and research in China. She has helped and encouraged me to undertake my career as a historian in China. Her generous support and love beyond limits have helped me to overcome great difficulties and to carry on with our life in the Far East. Without her, this book would not have been possible.

In addition, I would like to express my gratitude to the Delegation of the European Union to China and Euraxess China, which has been essential in expanding the scientific results and GECM output to Chinese academic and non-academic audiences. The main goal is to transfer knowledge from China to Europe and vice versa, as well as spreading the history and culture of Europe within China. The constant and generous support of Philippe Vialatte (Minister Counsellor, Head of Science and Technology Section of the Delegation of the European Union to China) and Halldor Berg (Chief Representative of Euraxess China) to the GECM Project and GHN is of great value when expanding our mission and fostering high-quality academic research among European and non-European researchers based in China.

Foreword

You are about to read an important book. Perhaps I can best defend this assertion by recounting a personal anecdote.

At the end of 1977, I arrived with my family in Murcia, a city on the Segura river in south-eastern Spain, which none of us had visited before. From the publications of Professor Juan Torres Fontes, one of Spain's most distinguished medieval historians and Murcia's municipal archivist, I knew that the collection of the volumes of the Actas capitulares, the minutes of the sessions of the city's civic council (ayuntamiento) survived with gaps from 1364–5. For the period after the fourteenth century, only two volumes are missing, one for the fifteenth century and one for the sixteenth. Important municipalities like Murcia typically administered a large territorial jurisdiction, and that of Murcia extended well beyond its irrigated orchards and fields. Its jurisdiction extended from the right bank of the Segura to the Mediterranean Sea and from the left bank well into the arid pasturelands for large flocks of goats and sheep. I had also read, on microfilm, a remarkable book published in 1621 by an important Golden Age writer and Murcian native, Francisco de Cascales (1563?–1642). As part of his Discursos históricos about Murcia, Cascales included brief chapters about many of the patrician families, highlighting their estates, marriages, office holding, service to Church and crown, and honours. I had begun to computerise this information, which provided the basis for the funding proposal I submitted to a joint Spanish–US committee to support my research in Murcia.

During almost twenty months, I read through the Actas capitulares and learned a great deal about the interests of the patrician councillors who held positions as jurados (parish representatives) and regidores (royally designated governors). My understanding of the cultural and social environments of the Murcian region was also greatly enriched by recent publications of young, talented French and Spanish researchers. On this basis, in 1980 I published a book (in Spanish) showing the impact of a Murcian social revolution, 1519–22, in the midst of a larger Castilian rebellion against the kingdom's royal administration. The revolutionary leaders exiled all of Murcia's elite councillors and their relatives in order to establish a broader-based municipal government. In exile the patrician councillors established a pact for joint action. My book tells the story of this revolutionary period and, until its demise in the 1540s and 1550s, the development of a more cohesive oligarchic government once the revolution had been defeated.

Because I intended to publish a second book recounting the subsequent crisis decade of the 1560s and the emergence from potential disaster of a much more cohesive oligarchy, I read all of the Actas capitulares until the middle of the seventeenth century. On this basis, in 1981 I published (in Spanish) a guide to the civic council from about 1500 until 1650. In this work I explain the nature of Murcia's government, and I list all of the jurados and regidores. I felt that one could not generalise about the actions of a deliberative body without knowing something about the motivations of those who participated in its meetings.

Because this type of research possessed implications well beyond the local, I sought to establish a model for work on municipal councils: a researcher would tie a historical narrative to published information about the men who held council seats and their families. Moreover, I hoped that if other historians knew the identities of the patrician councillors during some important period, they would focus their work on other archival collections in order to enrich our understanding of these men and the interactions of elite men and women, which shaped not only Murcia's history but that of the expanding, planetary Hispanic monarchy as well.

Along with others, Manuel Perez-Garcia answered my call. The promulgation of the Spanish constitution of 1978 opened a period of regionalism in the country's political and cultural life, and the publication of local histories founded on municipal and regional archives emerged as something of a 'cottage industry'. However, Perez-Garcia's ambition extends well beyond this often limited genre. To achieve his goals, he exploits a variety of important types of archival holdings beyond the records of the civic council, which

I used. Moreover, he expands the chronological limits of the story to encompass over five centuries, and its geographical limits to encompass the kingdom of Murcia (roughly the modern provinces of Albacete and Murcia) and territories beyond its boundaries. From this broad perspective, he recognises that the key activities, which would show the dense connections among elite men and women, pointed to the founding, maintenance, and expansion of entailed estates (mayorazgos), the major family legal tool for avoiding the damaging fragmentation of a lineage's patrimony among multiple heirs. To carve his way through the dense jungle surrounding the entailed estate, particularly over a long period of time, Perez-Garcia selects an important lineage, the Riquelme, whose fortunes he could follow over a number of centuries. These two brilliant decisions – to focus on entailed estates (and inheritance conflicts) and on the social networks of the resilient Riquelme – enable him to make an outstanding contribution to our growing understanding of the Hispanic monarchy until the entire edifice of what some historians call the 'Old Regime' crumbled when liberal constitutionalism emerged as a revolutionary force, which changed for ever the political framework and themes of conflict and social cohesion for a new Spanish nation.

Introduction

Western and eastern values of society underscore the family as a fundamental social structure and institution.<sup>1</sup> The family reveals the most significant sociocultural features of European communities in a given context, and these become central communication channels back to the family. This idea asserts James Casey's axiom that family and society are part of a single unit.<sup>2</sup>

The family is at the centre of this study and is also its organisational reference: through the structure of the family, I show how a complex and highly hierarchised society like the ancien régime's worked and evolved. Furthermore, the individual is the main protagonist of this social tapestry. The tracking of the life-cycle, namely by following main vital events such as birth, marriage and death becomes the main technique and method to explore an individual's world and social reality.<sup>3</sup> This study focuses on reconstructing the life trajectory of members of the most important urban oligarchic families, analysing the social behaviour and modus operandi of this social elite in southern Spain.

A close look into the institutions and the socioeconomic evolution of the Crown of Castile, of which the kingdom of Murcia was part, and its connections to the elites that were closer to court in Madrid and also to the kingdom of Portugal, allows the analysis of the modus vivendi and the behavioural patterns of the oligarchy in early modern Europe.<sup>4</sup> Specifically, this book explores the case of two families of the oligarchy, the Riquelme and the Fontes y Paz families, and analyses the behaviour and social evolution of the individuals involved in these families and their relationships with other oligarchical families during the ancien régime and at the turn of the nineteenth century in Spain. This is a study of the local, within the framework of microhistory, that also aims to better explain the global-scale transformations that were ongoing in early modern southern Europe.<sup>5</sup> My goal is to understand and comprehend how members of the elite acted and moved through diverse social circumstances through the use of mechanisms and strategies that helped them maintain a closed society and also prevented lower estates from entering their high social stratum. However, as this book demonstrates, there were times and social contexts in which the group of families that were at the top of the social pyramid were not so closed among themselves. This social mestizaje (fusion) is the result of a social survival strategy where the oligarchy allied with emerging socioeconomic groups coming from the business world, who themselves sought to emulate the old oligarchy and move upward through the acquisition of nobility titles.<sup>6</sup>

Contrasts and contradictions defined European baroque society, making the study of the family and its evolution during different phases and times extremely complex. The idea of the 'group's interest' versus the 'individual's interest' is therefore fundamental in this analysis. The individual, in a hierarchised society such as the ancien régime, is not isolated, but rather follows a pattern or guide to be able to promote himself socially and have a high social, political and economic position in society. The concepts of lineage and the home thus emerged strongly. Individuals from the most illustrious and pre-eminent families of the oligarchy in southern Spain (the kingdom of Murcia) acted along the group patron's standards, who himself represented, preserved and symbolised the memory of the fundador de la casa (founder of the house), a common ancestor and mythical figure acting as image of a glorious past that itself extolled the lineage. The head of household was the pater familias, a superior figure to whom all other individuals of the family group were subject for protection. The concept of the family group or lineage must not be understood within the framework of the nuclear family or immediate family.<sup>7</sup> Rather, it is the affiliation and belonging to a group defined as more than one generation cohabiting in the same physical space or casa (house) and, in terms of the symbolic sphere, refers to the belonging given through blood and family ties embedded in old and noble families since the Reconquista.

Another suggestive and evocative term that will surface is that of social reproduction – a concept that reflects preservation and permanency within the main institutions of power and the consolidation of the socioeconomic status of the family group.<sup>8</sup> Such a concept means perpetuation. In other words, social reproduction is the mechanism that social classes use to achieve reproduction and, ideally, a perpetual belonging to groups and families of power, who created specific strategies to reproduce, maintain and aspire to high status and an elevated level of patrimonial wealth mainly in Mediterranean Europe.<sup>9</sup> The Riquelme family, like most of the other lineages of the oligarchy from the time of settlement in the kingdom of Murcia in the thirteenth century, focused on social reproduction by remaining in the different conquered public powers – political, social, economic and religious, generation after generation.

In turn, there was an ideal of duration and perpetuity that manifested itself through memory, identity, representation and symbolism, terms that were reflected in perfect symbiosis between the individual and the collective within the group. It was the confluence of interests of the social actor closely related to those of the family group that boosted the symbolic capital of the family (in itself structured through kinship) as a collective institution. This study also shows that there were times of negotiation, tension and conflict when rupture and separation of interests between the individual and the collective or group occurred.<sup>10</sup> This internal disunity of the family group resulted in frictions and disputes within the lineage that weakened it and forced its social stagnation.

Marriage was among the strongest strategies and mechanisms used to counteract such social processes of immobilism.<sup>11</sup> Unions between important and powerful families, through studied and rigorous marriage arrangements, had it as their objective to maintain or augment the socioeconomic and political power of the families. Marriage meant relational capital, or the strengthening of blood ties between the powerful families, developing a new problem for the scholar, as kinship needs to be analysed in its social dimension. This book explains how the ties that connected individuals, the extent and frequency in which these links took place, are representative of the degree of patronage and clientelism developed among them and within family groups.

To reconstruct the intricate complex of social relationships that an individual goes through in his life-cycle, I use the sociological concept of 'social network analysis'.<sup>12</sup> Mapping out the social network of ancien régime Mediterranean European society can prove difficult, however, owing to the scarcity of sources. But mostly the challenge arises because of the variety of social relationships that individuals develop, not only within their own high social stratum but also with middle and lower social groups. Though it may appear contradictory, this amalgam of social relationships is only the result of the set of interests and strategies that the lineage adopts as it adapts to certain social circumstances, with the aim of maintaining a balance of power among different social groups and maintaining and perpetuating itself.

Consanguinity, patronage, fictitious kinship, alliance, paisanaje (common local origin) and friendship are what sustained the ties and bonds mentioned above. Hence the network of relationships that the family generates is fundamental. Nevertheless, it is important to emphasise that elements of consanguinity and kinship are not always present when building a social network – in contrast, there were many cases where strong ties among ‘non-consanguineals’ (allegados), closely related individuals, were formed based only on solid friendship and patronage. Relationships were created, built, consolidated, and also contested, through conquering the different ecclesiastical and seigneurial powers, as well as those at court (as space for social promotion) surrounding the figure of the king.

The long-term framework and perspective (longue durée) is also central to this study.<sup>13</sup> By following the individuals’ life-cycles within local oligarchies and their lineages during long time spans, this book shows how social changes occurred from era to era, from medieval times to early modern, and also then to the modern era. Though this study does not attempt to present a definitive analytical method, or a solution to understanding social transformation, it calls for the scholarship of early modern southern Europe to broaden its temporal and spatial framework so that a comparative methodology can be used to include new case studies. Long-term approaches allow us to understand the role that family networks as power structures employed through time, and how the individuals and elites linked to them perpetuated their position in the public sphere. The key is to unravel such processes of adaptation or metamorphosis of the elites, analysing their ability to remain in power and gather new economic and political levels of power in each period.<sup>14</sup>

This book borrows from other fields of knowledge in the social sciences and the humanities such as history, economics, anthropology, sociology, modern languages, international studies and others aiming for broader, but also richer and deeper, conclusions that can shed light on the complex process that is social transformation. In addition, the contributions and continuous renewal of approaches to studying the family within history subdisciplines, namely global history, economic history and historical demography,<sup>15</sup> have recently provided significantly helpful models of analysis, enriching studies that focus on family reconstruction, the attention to the concept of life-cycle, the building of genealogies, and emphasis on social networks.<sup>16</sup> Within these fields, scholars have contributed to explaining and clarifying the complex mechanisms and the social processes of the ancien régime, shedding light on the complexity of how strategies and relationships in social groups operate where there is a system of both vertical and horizontal relationships, and interweaving this analysis with concepts of hierarchy, hegemony, patronage, clientelism and fidelity.

This research approach represents both continuity and renewal in regard to what we know about family life and economy, since it considers the family as the main social structure and thus the institution through which social changes can best be observed. The studies that advocate the combination of microhistory and global history have forced the revision of many generalisations in traditional scholarship about the impact that household and family groups and society played in large social, economic and cultural processes.<sup>17</sup>

In this sense, to determine the causes and the consequences of the entire process of change is arduous – the interaction of individual versus society, in its multiple formats, and how these operate at the core of the family, is a key factor in explaining social transformation. The permanence and the durability of family structures such as inheritance practices, sociability and a specific culture around genealogy, counterbalance the transition from the ancien régime to liberalism, and are fundamental in the study of change over time and of the transition from pre-industrial to modern societies. The extent of resistance generated from family groups and traditional institutions will determine the speed at which the change towards modernity occurs. Such a factor explains that, in western and eastern societies, the models of economic development diverged during the first industrialisation, resulting in some more developed societies while others stagnated, as can be seen in the case of the northern and north-western European economies (United Kingdom, the Netherlands, and Belgium) on the one hand, and China on the other.<sup>18</sup>

The family as an important subject of study has been seen as a phenomenon that resulted from cultural, social, economic and political construction, rather than analysis of it in relation to the concepts of extended family, lineage, paisanaje and the institutions of the community in which the family lives. I thus argue that the family is the starting point in understanding the social, political, economic and cultural patterns in which the individual is involved in a specific period of time. The goal of historians who study the family should therefore be, in the case of Spain, to determine to what extent the family explains the evolution of Spanish society.<sup>19</sup> This book seeks both to build upon and to contribute to the scholarship that emphasises, and in some way renews, within the paradigms of microhistory and global history, the importance of analysing more exhaustively socioeconomic and cultural changes that occurred around the household and the domestic space. In the last couple of decades, the complexity of social changes has been well shown through the intense study of family groups and social actors. Scholars have demonstrated that this process of transformation is extremely slow and based upon strong and close relationships and social ties that had been forming for centuries. Thus I assert my claim to cross the hard chronological and disciplinary barriers that have contained the historian in straitjacketed perspectives, resulting in narrow and biased studies, both in regard to time and space, which have also created unclear conclusions and models to explain socioeconomic change in western and eastern societies.<sup>20</sup>

Lineage Glory and Honour in the Late Middle Ages: Conquest and Consolidation of Economic Power

1.1. War, Power and Land: From the Middle Ages to the Early Modern Period (1265–1350)

The actions that the Riquelme family pursued in the last third of the thirteenth century to become part of the troops to conquer the kingdom of Murcia were in perfect alignment with the Castilian monarchy's reconquest campaign. The Riquelme would later settle in the kingdom after receiving the donación (donation) of lands and heredamientos (inheritances) that the crown provided in return for their services rendered during the conquest campaigns.<sup>1</sup>

The Riquelme lineage was a typical case of an outsider family that permanently settled in the kingdom of Murcia during the reconquest of the Iberian peninsula.<sup>2</sup> They were part of a larger group of the peninsula's Christian population that moved to the Murcian territory seeking easy riches and a comfortable way of life. Nevertheless, there were limits to their aims to increase their family wealth and estate. Among the difficulties that the new settlers faced and that truly hindered their socioeconomic development were the scarcity of land given, lack of resources to exploit the inherited properties, the limited productivity of the land and the lack of water.<sup>3</sup>

For legitimacy and real social advancement, the making of what can be defined as 'historical memory' began. Thus, among the Riquelme family group, the concepts of lineage, family, political strategies, social reproduction and a hereditary system began to take shape around the framework of land possession in southern Spain. It was during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries that the true lineage identity started to become coherent – and it happened around an already fixed heritage and estate, and an established surname. As James Casey says, ‘up until the thirteenth century, genealogies were like an entangled web from which a fortuitous man emerges from the average, makes a fortune and takes upon a lineage for himself, which is based on a last name that comes from the tower or town that he himself built.’<sup>4</sup>

The concept of the family provides a framework to analyse the acting mechanisms and the behavioural patterns of the individual, which he drew from the group’s interest. In the Castilian system, las Partidas (Divisions) show that the group was structured strictly in a conjugal fashion (husbands and sons).<sup>5</sup> However, some scholars have noted that the family, during the late medieval period, was already using specific mechanisms to build up a group that would be identified through lineage, which in itself was defined through close ties of kinship and common interests.<sup>6</sup> Kinship at the time was becoming a cultural phenomenon subject to the Church’s rules, established in Europe after the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), in regard to the degree of consanguinity – or real kinship – though these norms were not always respected.<sup>7</sup> Political strategies and social reproduction worked hand in hand, and they became extremely valuable in the late medieval period in providing the family with a true idea of group cohesion. In this sense, marriage was a fundamental tool in this process.<sup>8</sup> In Mediterranean Europe the social strategies that lineages used were based on setting up marriage alliances to ultimately place the family group on top of the social hierarchy, to socially reproduce the lineage and to avoid its biological depletion by establishing a perpetual succession line.

A bilinear type of succession defined the hereditary system of the late medieval period in southern Europe, one in which the individual and the group could choose which offspring path to follow – either female or male. However, the male succession line prevailed, opening the way to the emergence of the mayorazgo (entailed estate) in the Iberian kingdoms, morgadio in Portugal.<sup>9</sup> In turn, marriage strategies fundamentally shaped any inheritance process and thus landownership became the main element of power among the nobility.<sup>10</sup>

Late medieval lineages cemented their idiosyncrasies within this edifice of ideas, and these also became central to their actions and modus operandi. During the early modern period in Europe and the Iberian kingdoms, the value of these concepts became even more grounded. Historians argue that ultimately lineage was nothing but a mental construction conceptualised around kinship, blood and the memory that needs to be materialised.<sup>11</sup> A late fifteenth-century Spanish chronicle by Fernando del Pulgar validates this affirmation, saying that in a world where everything is of divine origin, 'God created man but not lineages'.<sup>12</sup>

The case of the Riquelme family can be understood in this theoretical framework – they were a typical case of a group that gained wealth by their participation in conquest and benefited from the Castilian crown's donations of land that followed. From the first possessions acquired in the early land partition process, the Riquelme family accumulated an extensive estate that over the years, and especially at the threshold of the sixteenth century, placed them among the Murcian landowning nobility.<sup>13</sup> The origin of the Riquelme family in Murcia is dated in Riquelme manuscript of 1265 the year of the conquest of Murcia.

Guillén Riquelme entered victorious [and conquering] into that city . . . and he was designated heir in it, among 323 illustrious other knights and settlers as it is shown in that book by king Alfonso X the Wise (on page 4) . . . he was at the capture of the city of Orihuela, the town of Lorca . . . and he received lands as it is shown in his archives and population books.

In the time of king Don Ferdinand, when the king of Aragon James II took the kingdom of Murcia from him and then the king of Aragon expelled from Murcia all the knights that had followed the campaign of Don Ferdinand, and Guillén Riquelme was among them, he sought refuge with king Don Ferdinand who, when he went down to reclaim his kingdom of Murcia, brought with him Guillén Riquelme as the main captain of his troops . . . the king of Murcia entered and ordered the lands of Guillén Riquelme to be returned to him.<sup>14</sup>

As is common in sources of the early modern period, the language exaggerates and glorifies the family's past, aiming to provide magnificence and honour to the lineage. The same document mentions that Riquelme individuals came from the great kingdom of France, from the house of Monfort, señores and counts of Tolosa. They came from the castle of Rodelas (city of Rochela) – Guillén de Monfort was among other wealthy men from France and Germany who came to the call of Don Pelayo.

Provided the Ricoielmo with weaponry and the piece of land where the Ricoielmo battle had taken place – that is, close to the valley of the castle of Maderuelo, and there is a place named Riquelme in memory of the battle. He was the captain of the Vizcayans, and he had a son that was Pedro Guillén de Monfort.<sup>15</sup>

The helmet in the Riquelme coat of arms has its origins in this event. The coat of arms shows a red field with a highlighted arm grabbing the helmet's plumed top ornament. The celada (crest), a symbol of defence, is the weapon that covers the head and represents life. The rest of the coat of arms confirms the achievement of the family's merits.<sup>16</sup> The chronicler Francisco Cascales wrote about this representation of the crest according to what Virgil declared in antiquity: “Unun pro cunctis dabitur caput” and “pro capite pugnare” is a proverb meaning to defend one's life – and to cover the head with the crest is to defend life with our weapons. The crest was the main weapon of the goddess and god of war, Pallas and Mars.<sup>17</sup>

Some notes about the origin of the last name Riquelme in royal letters mention that this family mainly settled in Murcia and that (though this is not completely certain) they had some origin in Genoa (Italy). The royal letters also reference the manuscripts of Don Miguel de Salazar, Juan de Buegas and Antonio de Varona, who wrote about the Riquelme and thus demonstrate hidalguía.<sup>18</sup> These notes are the only ones different from the notes written by Cascales. The remaining news that Cascales told and the royal letters are strictly the same – an indication that the information in the royal letters, dated in 1769, was copied from the news about the lineage that Cascales wrote about in 1621.<sup>19</sup>

However, the Riquelme manuscript was probably redacted before Cascales's Discursos Historicos, which makes the 1265 manuscript the first – and thus the most reliable – to mention the Riquelme lineage in the early modern period, with no other objective but the glorification of the lineage. The three sources mention, in seeking to aggrandise the lineage, that

They came from the mountains in France with many others to support king Don Pelayo in his quest to conquer Spain; of which lineage there are great knights in Catalonia, in Jerez de la Frontera and in Murcia, who like others in earlier times tried nothing but to take back our Spain from the Moors and came looking for the opportunity of honour.<sup>20</sup>

This is how Guillén Riquelme became that glorious forefather of the lineage – his participation in the Castilian conquest of the kingdom of Murcia came to be the main form of validation and a source of honour and prestige for the lineage. Guillén Riquelme appears as one of the main settlers of the city of Murcia, and also the one, among other Riquelme family members, who received more land from the king of Castile, Alfonso X the Wise.<sup>21</sup> In the book of land partitions of Murcia during the thirteenth century, there are six secular individuals and two clergy documented whose social status was within the middle social strata of the new settlers of the kingdom of Murcia.<sup>22</sup> Two clearly different social categories appeared in the book: knights and peones (unfree labour subject to peonage).

Depending on their place in the social structure, each of these members of the Riquelme family received higher- or lower-quality lands. Part of what they received was high-quality heredamientos (inheritances) and irrigated lands by the Segura river.<sup>23</sup> Most of the land that they were given, a total of 88 tahúllas (measure of land in the kingdom of Murcia), was in the Cudiacibid cuadrilla (unit of land). This alquería was in the outskirts of Murcia, and it was divided into four types of land: the vegetable orchard (highly valued), a piece of land that needed manual irrigation, an albar section and a swamp section or almarjal.<sup>24</sup>

From the heredamiento (inheritance) of the five alquerías they received a total of 24 tahúllas, the lowest-quality piece of land that the Riquelme family received.<sup>25</sup> These lands were a semi-swamp, usually given to individuals of a lower social category. The Riquelme received a small portion of land of the lower quality – the Alfande area had both irrigated lands and gardens; the acquisition of Beniazor was a diverse section of mostly albar, though it could rotate with irrigation and vegetable gardens; and the Albadel region was the most sought after because of the quality of the land and the abundance of water; 105.5 tahúllas of irrigation land and 90 of albar in the Beninaya cuadrilla went to twenty-five settlers, middle- and low-level peon. There were other important irrigation zones like Benicot and Benicomay.

As shown in the chart of partitions, most of the lands that the Riquelme received dated to the third (1266–7) and fourth (1269–70) partitions. After the third partition, the Riquelme lineage maintained the lands that Alfonso X granted during the first partition. The king of Aragon James I's partition was ratified. The fourth and fifth partition completed each of the previous donations.

The Riquelme lineage began their venture in the kingdom of Murcia during the reign of Alfonso X. The settlement, however, was interrupted during the reign of Sancho IV while Aragonese forces led by James II invaded Murcia. The king of Aragon expelled all knights loyal to the Castilian king, Ferdinand IV. Among them was Guillén Riquelme.<sup>26</sup> The Riquelme permanently settled in Murcia only after the Torrellas decision in 1304 that returned property and lands to the expelled Castilian groups. This time around, the Riquelme family consolidated an important amount of land and other properties in the orchard of Murcia.

Over time, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, these possessions increased, not only in the irrigated land suitable for gardening areas within the limits of the city of Murcia, but also all around the kingdom of Murcia and especially in the border strip on the opposite side of the Nasrid kingdom of Granada. This location of both dry lands and irrigated territories was strategic for the definitive push in the reconquest. As with other sectors in the oligarchy, the power of the Riquelme family lay in landownership. The Riquelme belonged to the landowning nobility of the kingdom of Murcia, and it was around the process of land acquisition and possession, and also using marriage as a strategy, that the Riquelme crafted a network of family alliances.

The evolution and implementation of the system of lineages combined with all these bilateral factors had different chronologies and nuances in each territory.<sup>27</sup> This system is tightly related to the consolidation of the aristocracy and the gradual replacement of the old nobility by the new. The Riquelme were part of the new nobility as clientele of the Fajardo lineage.<sup>28</sup>

In the case of Murcia several factors came into play for this consolidation to happen. On one side, because the nobility disputes (Manuel against Fajardo) occurred in a borderland territory with Islam, war became an element for social promotion among the new lineages. On the other side, and closely related with the first, was the factor of the increasing señorialización (consolidation of lordship) in the territory. This was the creation of señoríos (land property) during the late medieval period based on the occupation of unpopulated or uncultivated lands, most of them donated by the crown through the concejo as reward for services rendered in the battle against Muslims from Granada.<sup>29</sup> In parallel to the process of feudalisation, the creation of mayorazgos, by which a family avoids the dispersal of the family patrimony by structuring it around the first-born male, also increased. Based on all these factors, lineage structures consolidated throughout the fifteenth century and were well embedded in society during the early modern period.

1.2. Consolidation of the Trastámara Dynasty: Reaching Economic and Political Powers (1369–1450)

Because of the scarcity of evidence to document this topic, primary sources are inevitably complemented by studies about the family and the nobility in the kingdom of Murcia published in the last several decades. Genealogy studies also play an important role in the process of reconstructing social trajectories of specific families and how each individual shaped their lineage.

Already in the early fourteenth century, chaos and bewilderment ravaged the kingdom of Murcia.<sup>31</sup> After the storm and the uncertainty, a new Murcian elite composed of cadres of new families settled in the kingdom. This process began when Guillén Riquelme, among other knights, travelled south to the kingdom of Murcia to participate in the conquest.<sup>32</sup> In reward for his participation, he became the first knight of the Riquelme family to hold a position in office. He was a regidor (member of the civic council) of Murcia and a procurador in court.<sup>33</sup> However, the occupation by king James II meant an interruption in the complete settlement of the family, though it resumed when Ferdinand IV took the realm.

In 1325, during Alfonso XI's reign, a concejo of forty regidores was created, marking the Riquelme's time to advance in the kingdom of Murcia. The adelantado named the regidores according to the decisions of the officials whom he also designated. This process was key to the new lineages in becoming part of the oligarchy. Little by little, by participating in the political life of the kingdom and by taking important decisions, they would gradually establish the sociopolitical reach of these 'new' families. The Riquelme were one of this new group of families holding regidurías, which also meant a period of renewal, both of regidores and jurados (city and concejo positions), and the assurance of gradual advancement and upward mobility of the families that achieved these posts.

Nobles and hidalgos used public office positions to be part of the old aristocracy. Having served in war to defend the crown was the most direct way to start participating in this process of social assimilation, and the process evolved and would be completed during the reign of Alfonso XI in the fourteenth century.

It is worth re-emphasising at this point that since the beginning of the fourteenth century and during most of the fifteenth, frequent disputes and fighting between families to obtain wealth and positions of power created a climate of convulsion and uncertainty in the kingdom of Murcia. However, 'new' families, the Riquelme among others, needed a leader with enough authority to help them accomplish their goals and see their expectations fulfilled. To do so, new families gathered and established alliances around the Fajardo family as the main lineage – the Fajardo were one of the most important lineages in the Murcian capital because of their close relation to the military order of Santiago and their kinship connections to the Ayala lineage.<sup>34</sup> Families united around the Fajardo to exercise more influence and to be immersed in new spaces of power.

For them, accessing positions in public office was the only path to power, and thus they gradually monopolised concejo positions which became their sole and most important aspiration. The Fajardo group was the best ally for the Riquelme in this purpose, since the Fajardo lineage was also on a mission to hold the post of the kingdom's adelantado mayor, from which both lineages (and other groups that supported the Fajardo) would benefit by obtaining more space and gaining more parcels of power. Another obstacle that both the new families needed to defeat, however, was the Manuel lineage, a legacy of the old nobility.<sup>35</sup>

A form of clientelism emerged from these crossings rooted in reciprocity and mutual benefit between giver and receiver.<sup>36</sup> These families wove a thick net of relationships that resulted in a social network of sociopolitical interests, with marriage as the most important tool used to advance their sociopolitical interests.<sup>37</sup> The role of the patrón, or head of the lineage, was also of great relevance, as his leadership in the lineage translated as the public representative of the group's interest. Alonso Yáñez Fajardo held the headship in his lineage during the civil war between Peter I and Henry of Trastámara.

Peter I's supporters were a majority in Murcia during the armed conflict. The Fajardo lineage, with its clientele of noble families and the Riquelme as well, defended Peter I's claims. However, the outcome of the conflict was unexpected for this group: the accession of Henry II to the throne of Castile. Under the Trastámara dynasty the interests of the old nobility gradually began to dissipate, and the new nobility groups replaced the older ones. Luis Suárez Fernández has named it the 'Trastámara revolution'.<sup>38</sup> It was under the reign of Alfonso XI, with his regimiento of forty oficiales (individuals coming from the lowest ranks of the nobility), that the process of new families entering the spaces of political power was completed.

Nevertheless, in this social process, the Riquelme increased their achievements in public office, even with the change of dynasty.<sup>39</sup> They would become part of what historians have named 'trastamarista nobility'.<sup>40</sup> But because of the dynasty change, the Riquelme had to shift strategies. They switched completely to the side of Henry II and deemed legitimate his right to the throne of Castile only so that the king would start favouring their cause. This 'Fajardo opportunism', changing loyalty from Peter I to Henry II and his noble followers, would be a political constant throughout the late medieval period and also in the early modern era.<sup>41</sup>

Henry II married the daughter of Don Juan Manuel, Juana Manuel. Don Juan had been named count of Carrión by Juan Sánchez Manuel, the adelantado mayor of the kingdom of Murcia. The specific goal behind this appointment was to reinforce royal authority in the kingdom of Murcia by implementing ordered and organised politics in this territory. There was a personal objective for the count of Carrión as well: to strengthen the power of the Manuel lineage.

The Fajardo and their supporters saw the appointment as inevitably harmful to the interests of the Murcian oligarchy, which were focused on obtaining more parcels of political power and being as independent as possible of royal influence. The goal was to establish an access system to the regidurías compatible with their aspirations to power – a system to access, participate in and manage political power. The Fajardo and their clientele represented what the new nobility was looking for, while the groups around the Manuel lineage, on the contrary, were hindering the access of these families to a higher sphere of political power.

The concejo served as the stage where the factions disputed their supremacy.<sup>42</sup> The victorious group would control political life in the kingdom of Murcia. The emerging framework of tension and violence in which this battle evolved remained a constant during this period, with spells of time when tension eased, but still a ceaseless period of violence that lasted throughout the early sixteenth century.

The conflict between nobility factions contributed to increasing the dangers and instability in the kingdom. In addition, Murcia bordered Islam both by land (it was the closest territory to the Muslim kingdom of Granada) and by sea, exposed to the attacks of berberisco fleets from North Africa. All of these circumstances, living under constant danger and in a state of violence in the Murcian territory, made men at the time violent and rough, and that fury and rage shaped their way of life.<sup>43</sup>

The means and ways were not what mattered, even when these were implemented with violence, if the final objective – to take important parcels of power in the realm – was accomplished. In this case, the goal was to obtain the post of adelantado mayor and establish a restrictive access system, confined to a few families, to the regidurías of the concejo.<sup>44</sup> Medievalists have for long said that the violence of men, as of the natural elements, always comes to the surface and affects all human activity. Sometimes it is men against men. The desire to satisfy all wants meets obstacles, breaks legal and moral boundaries, and force is used, with malice, darkness, freedom from justice, and any means and tactics deemed necessary to achieve the ultimate desire.<sup>45</sup> The event that Juan Riquelme recorded is good evidence of this description:

In the named concejo it was told and notified that on Saturday night when the sun was rising on Sunday, bad men had been drinking at the house of a woman known as the mellada of Joahan Riquelme, cristiano nuevo, whom they tried to kill and wanted to take sewn in a seron to be thrown into the river; however, this event became known to Gonzalo Rodríguez de Avilés, mayor, for the mayor to make justice according to law. And the concejo and the oficiales and good men required of the mayor to do justice according to law. And the concejo and the oficiales and the good men say that seeing that this event was bad and ugly, they required and confronted Gonzalo Rodríguez de Avilés, mayor, on behalf of the king, to let him know of the truth of this terrible event and to prosecute the malefactors for their faults; and we protest that if he does not do it, we will demand that the king intervene and require the malefactors to testify . . .<sup>46</sup>

There is other evidence of acts that the Riquelme family perpetrated in this era of violence and conflict. It is important to note as well that the late sixteenth century was a time of shortage and scarcity of commodities, mostly caused by political instability. Family groups that were slowly climbing the sociopolitical ladder took advantage of this volatility.

At times when scarcity coincided with prolonged looting and assaults by the almogávares, for example, the price of fish increased. Individuals with enough capital negotiated and speculated in the price of fish to increase their regular income at a time when the demand was assured. Juan Riquelme 'el viejo', regidor of the concejo between 1378 and 1391 and alcalde (mayor) at the oficio de adelantamiento for the adelantado Juan Rodríguez de Salamanca in 1407, in the midst of war against the Crown of Aragon, which deeply affected the stability of coastal regions, ventured to buy one hundred jarras (pitchers) of tuna that he later offered to bring to sell in Murcia if an appropriate, 'sufficient' selling price was assured to him.<sup>47</sup>

Francisco Riquelme, regidor (1414–20, 1424–30) and mayor in 1397, son of Juan Riquelme 'el viejo' and married to Isabel Gómez Dávalos, daughter of the adelantado Pedro Gómez Dávalos and niece of the adelantado mayor of the realm Alonso Yáñez Fajardo, was the protagonist in a similar case.<sup>48</sup> Through this marriage, which constituted a strong alliance between the family groups, the Riquelme lineage had greatly advanced their already highly regarded position. Francisco Riquelme was earning among the highest incomes in the city and he also owned cabañas with twenty heads of livestock. Seeing the scarcity of meat in 1375, he brought some of his animals to the city to assure supply.<sup>49</sup> Powerful groups took advantage of crises at the end of the century to increase their private capital and continue establishing their control over the urban space.

In such a hostile climate, the disputes between the factions of the Manuel and the Fajardo lineages continued to escalate. The constant alteration of the system to access the regimiento, and the number of possible members who comprised it, caused multiple moments of extreme tension. In 1371 Enrique returned to Alfonso XI's system – a concejo of forty non-lifetime members. But the position of the adelantado Juan Sánchez Manuel in the Murcian capital was null, and the narrow and closed fajardista oligarchy finally restored a concejo of sixteen lifetime members. While Juan Sánchez Manuel maintained the adelantamiento away from Murcia, his opponents retained all effective authority. As the control of the Manuel lineage continued to decrease, the Fajardo gained more and more parcels of power. Evidence of this reinforcement of Fajardo control in the capital came when Juan Sánchez Manuel was completely humiliated at his bastard son Juan Sánchez Manuel, mayor of Cartagena, not being recognised regidor.<sup>50</sup>

Alonso Yáñez Fajardo's path to the adelantamiento of Murcia came when Juan Sánchez Manuel died in 1378. The new king, John I, named Alonso Yáñez Fajardo the lieutenant of the adelantado. The opposing faction still had alternative ways to continue striking against their opponents. The fajardista parties, following their aim to narrow the regidurías, reduced the number of regidores from sixteen to thirteen by not renewing positions when a regidor died – they had made regidurías lifetime appointments. By concentrating these positions among a small group of families, these families ended up controlling political power in the capital of Murcia and also sparked great resentment and envy among the low and middle patrician sectors. Juan Sánchez Manuel, the former adelantado's son, knew how to take advantage of this, and he led an urban rebellion in 1391 that ended with the expulsion of Alonso Yáñez Fajardo and his followers from the city of Murcia. After such a major, unexpected setback to the Fajardo faction, their personal and real property, including their cereal plantations, were also expropriated. An important set of fajardistas' lands like those belonging to the adelantado Pedro Gómez Dávalos was similarly seized.

In March 1391, the Consejo de Regencia, following what was stated in the ordenamiento of Alfonso I, and while Henry III was still a minor, provided the concejo with the traditionally held right to choose annually, among all the hombres buenos (good men) in the city, the oficiales who took positions in the concejo. From this time onward the concejo made the designations from a group formed by two hombres buenos from each parish.

Older regidores, who were easily accessing the regidurías and also pretending to be part of a close oligarchic body, were also expelled. Such was the case of Juan Riquelme.<sup>52</sup> His family, like others from the local oligarchy, had achieved an acceptable income level by going up the social hierarchy. The Riquelme's gradual advance stagnated for some time, however, after this severe setback.

However, all these events ended up being only a sort of illusion for the Manuel faction, since their standing was already weak and had been experiencing many internal frictions. A sign of this was Juan Sánchez Manuel's opportunism: in 1391 he fled the capital and made a pact with the adelantado to participate in looting harvests and destroying irrigation fields built just that year.<sup>53</sup> In this context, the monarchy knew that their own fate was connected to that of the fajardista cause, which made the crown send a corregidor to the capital before getting rid of the services of the adelantado Alonso Yañez Fajardo. On behalf of, and to enforce, royal authority Ruy Méndez de Soto Mayor was sent to the capital in 1394.

Families then set up alliances with each of the factions. There were entire families supporting the Fajardo, especially the families representing the eleven expelled regidores: Magán, Muñón, Ponce, Sánchez de León, Fernández de Toledo, Riquelme, Peñaranda and Junterón. The disputes between the two factions worsened at the time, with the Fajardo gradually gaining control against the slowly diminishing power of the Manuel lineage. Mula's, and specially Lorca's concejo, were the first two groups where the Fajardo found refuge and support.<sup>54</sup>

A series of concatenated events meant the final failure of the Manuel group and the triumph of the Fajardo. Among these were the appointment of Ruy Méndez de Soto Mayor as adelantado mayor after the death of Alonso Yañez Fajardo in 1395, the institutional reforms in the concejo in the fifteenth century – with the gradual aristocratisation of the institution as a result – and the 1401 expulsion of Juan Sánchez Manuel. The interest of Dávalos in finding in the Fajardo a popular base to maintain the city, the 'omes buenos . . . e llanos', and to consolidate as a new lineage against the old nobility personified in the figure of Juan Sánchez Manuel, was obvious.

The Riquelme family wanted to reinforce and strengthen their alliance with the Fajardo by approaching the Dávalos lineage. The marriage between Francisco Riquelme and Isabel Gómez Dávalos, as well as the marriage between the adelantado Pedro Gómez Dávalos's daughter and the adelantado mayor Alonso Yañez Fajardo's niece, were key to the future of the Riquelme lineage. Through their marriage strategies, the Riquelme lineage gradually became more relevant in the political life of the kingdom. They were part of the Fajardo clientele that exercised the role of the patrón of the lineage. Antoni Maczak subtly points out that ‘the patron–client relationship was a medieval heritage’ which was common in southern Europe.<sup>55</sup>

Political power became finally Fajardo-driven with the appointment of Alonso Yañez Fajardo II as adelantado mayor of Murcia in 1424. The triumph of this lineage also meant that other families like the Riquelme were victorious in their long-awaited goal of appointing lifetime regidurías controlled by only a few families. The 1424 order by John II to establish only sixteen regidurías ruled by lifetime members represented the final triumph of the Murcian oligarchy.<sup>56</sup> Not in vain, it was evidence that during the reign of John II the Riquelme took over more and more seats in the Murcian concejo and greatly advanced in the sociopolitical sphere of the kingdom.<sup>57</sup>

Francisco Riquelme, who was the alcalde (1424–30), on behalf of the noble estate, was appointed as one of the sixteen regidores perpetuos (lifetime) that John II institutionalised in 1424. His brother experienced something similar – Bernardo Riquelme, holding the post between 1420 and 1424, and Diego Riquelme, regidor perpetuo from 1432 to 1480.<sup>58</sup> Likewise, at the beginning of John II’s reign, the uncle of Diego and Bernardo Riquelme, Juan Riquelme ‘el mozo’, was regidor for a year in 1408.<sup>59</sup> By this time, it was sufficiently proved that the establishment of a restrictive access system in the regidurías, by making the posts lifetime positions, was a watershed event in consolidating the Riquelme family as one of the most powerful groups in the kingdom of Murcia.

1.3. Service at the Frontier: ‘Land Warriors’ as Major Landowners of the Crown (1369–1520)

By the mid-fifteenth century, the lineage system was fully embedded, developed, and consolidated in Castilian society. Its establishment varied, depending on the territory, however.<sup>60</sup> Murcia’s border was with the kingdom of Granada, and as a frontier territory it acquired distinct nuances.<sup>61</sup> And, as explained in the previous sections, the disputes between nobility factions to obtain as much control as possible were one of these nuances.<sup>62</sup> The tension between the Manuel and the Fajardo groups, and all the clientele behind them, was a good example of this. Among the factors involved in understanding the consolidation of the Castilian aristocracy, in the case of Murcia, are the geostrategic space of this kingdom.

The conflict between factions never disappeared in Mediterranean Europe. On the contrary, tensions now were at the heart of the lineage as they were intrafamily disputes. This section focuses on the relevance of the kingdom of Murcia as borderland territory in Europe.<sup>63</sup> Murcia marked the line between two religions, Islam and Christianity, and the battle against Muslim incursions became the ideal frame for the process of social advance that a high number of families pursued at the time.<sup>64</sup> By providing military services to the crown at times of war they continued to receive gracias y mercedes (graces and grants) in compensation.<sup>65</sup>

The frontier factor was tightly connected to the process of feudalisation of the land – after a part of the land was occupied and freed of attacks from the invader, the creation of señoríos (lord-owned lands) connected to wealth and family property took place. The case of the Riquelme family and the services they provided at the border with the kingdom of Granada is a good example of the connections between war and the following foundation of the señoríos of Santo Ángel (in the Murcian orchard) and Campo Coy (in the Lorca lands).<sup>66</sup>

During the early years of the fifteenth century, the caballería (cavalry) found itself in a very conflictive situation. Traditional caballeresco (cavalry, knight) values were losing meaning, and knights were more and more seen as mercenaries that only went to war – knocking out and destroying everything on their way – for monetary remuneration.<sup>67</sup> Based on the Chronicle of Alfonso XI, ‘The cavalry has not only lost their ethical principles, but also its traditional function and the spirit of belonging. The only thing that distinguishes knights from those who are not knights is lineage.’<sup>68</sup>

One of the most important objectives during the reign of Alfonso XI was the renewal of the ethics and the military strategies of the cavalry through the reactivation of war against Granada. The border was a moving line in which small clashes between the two sides took place. The previous loss of pride as members of the cavalry came back by recovering the military qualities or, in other words, by continuing fighting activity with the most noble of its meanings in mind – as written in the Poema de Mío Cid – and against

Islam.<sup>69</sup> As George Duby explained, in the European Latin world, three phenomena had come together since the eleventh century: first, the expansion of feudal landownership; second, a new method of appointing knights had been evolving; and as result, third, an emerging bellicose period was developing.<sup>70</sup>

The need to reinforce the new model of war was through European cavalry. Alfonso XI tried to resume the reconquest by creating a large-scale enterprise that had not been seen since the one Sancho IV formed for Tarifa. However, the monarch had trouble recruiting troops. At the time, the ongoing process of the decline in caballeresco values was aggravated by being close to the border, which was a location noted for looting, traffic and illegal trade of goods not allowed to be exported from Castile.<sup>71</sup> In 1348, Alfonso XI implemented the Ordenamiento of Alcalá to provide a legal frame to his goal of updating the caballería villana (cavalry from the towns). The cavalry was armed with the idea that knights would maintain their horses and armour depending on their amount of property. The ultimate goal was to 'be ready and prepared for war against the Moors'.<sup>72</sup>

A consequence of this legislation was the gradual assimilation – and confusion among caballeros – of the caballería popular (people's cavalry) and the one based on lineage. This process of social assimilation, beginning with the land partitions of Alfonso X when families from the middle strata began to gain wealth, reached a new height as recruitment needs increased in the fourteenth century. As expected, it was difficult for those in the higher ranks of society to accept this assimilation of the new and the old nobility, and this became an important trigger for nobility disputes.

Though this is a highly debated issue in recent historiography, the idea that the new urban oligarchy advanced through war and because of the permeability of the most powerful groups has been widely accepted.<sup>73</sup> The emergence of the patriciado caballeresco (patrician knights) was rooted in urban knight culture, and this group was formed by individuals with important positions in public office who also counted on the support of their own lineages and power groups.<sup>74</sup> The Castilian patriciado was different from the rest of Europe's in that it was grounded in the socioeconomic base of war and land, based on a perfect symbiosis of material foundation and ideological principles. As Jiménez Alcázar said, 'prestige acquired as much loved intrinsic value as money does.'<sup>75</sup>

The Riquelme followed the model of this group of caballeros villanos. The families in this lineage were part of the conquest and settlement efforts in the kingdom of Murcia. The donations from Alfonso X's repartimientos were just the beginning of a process of land accumulation that gradually increased the family's wealth and thus their access to appointments in the concejo and especially in the regidurías.

The later alliance with the Fajardo and the legal frame that Alfonso XI defined to advance war in 1348 enhance the evidence about the Riquelme being part of this new social group of caballeros cuantiosos, whom Sobaler Seco calls gente nueva (new people) in the case of Soria or hombres nuevos (new men) if we use José Ángel Lema Puedo's terminology of his studies of the Guipuzcoan elites.<sup>76</sup> They entered the new social layer of the nobility that displaced the old one. Other evidence that confirms the completion of this process was a concejo tax on neighbours with the highest incomes in Murcia. The padrón de cuantiosos murcianos (census of wealthy individuals in Murcia) that parishes collected shows that the Riquelme group was among the wealthier in the city.<sup>77</sup> War was the group's main tool for social promotion during the late medieval period. The participation of the Riquelme in the campaigns that the Castilian monarchy led in the last third of the fourteenth century and in the fifteenth helped the lineage rise to the top of the social pyramid.

The campaign in Portugal to recognise John I as sovereign of the kingdom that started in 1348 was the first example of this phenomenon.<sup>78</sup> The Castilian crown's effort was disastrous, and the troops were almost all lost. The battle of Aljubarrota aggravated the defeat, and also the deep economic crises that followed in Castile, though these armed conflicts were not so unfortunate for the Riquelme because John I, and the Trastámara monarchs afterward, recognised and appreciated the group and their services rendered.

King John I immediately began to send recruiting letters ordering concejos to start enlistment of troops.<sup>79</sup> The orders sought to recruit as many troops as possible, avoiding extensive exemption, and this is why many hidalgos (lower nobles) were called to arms.<sup>80</sup> However, many of the hidalgos, especially from the oldest families, evaded the call believing themselves exempt from military service on the payment of pechos and tribute – they argued that their interests as a privileged estate would be damaged by going to war. By contrast, the caballeros villanos, who had been assimilated into the old hidalgo families, agreed to participate in the campaigns.

Since the time when Alfonso XI enacted the Alcalá regulatory measures to relaunch war and reconquest, a process of mestizaje within the old body of the nobility had been taking place as the caballeros villanos equated their status to the vieja nobleza and went even further. The social body of hidalgo families also became more diverse as a result, which has generated some confusion in the historiography of the last couple of decades.<sup>81</sup>

The new (assimilated) families agreed without hesitation to participate in war to increase their prestige and social status. In the Riquelme case, a letter from John I when he was in Almeida said: 'Juan Riquelme, regidor for the noble estate, agreed to place bastimentos by the walls because there were rumours that the English who were coming to defend Portugal wanted to attack the kingdom of Murcia first.'<sup>82</sup>

Likewise, Juan Riquelme's son, Francisco Riquelme, alcalde for the nobility and regidor of Murcia, who had been ordered to take care of the border, assisted John I in the Portugal campaign with 1,500 gold maravedies (Muslim currency).<sup>83</sup> The letter to recruit in Murcia had ordered the enlistment of everyone who had obtained the title of hidalgo since the death of Alfonso XI.

The overall result of this campaign was the decline of Castilian aspirations to conquering Portugal. However, the novel participation of some new families like the Riquelme was rewarded with substantial benefits. The monarchy recognised them, and this helped their gradual entrance to court.

1.3.1. Participation in the Campaigns of Granada: Expanding Land and Ownership

The Fajardo, as a fronterizo group, and led by the adelantado mayor of Murcia Alonso Yáñez Fajardo II, played a crucial role in the last period of reconquest in the Iberian peninsula. They supported a number of urban oligarchic families (the Riquelme family was one of them) to be constantly active at the border in ultimately conquering the kingdom of Granada.

The adelantado mayor position, the most important political appointment in the kingdom, was in the hands of the Fajardo group, and after the marriage between Francisco Riquelme and Isabel Gómez Dávalos, niece of the kingdom's adelantado mayor, Alonso Yáñez Fajardo, the Riquelme were inside the power orbit. This family and political union helped the Riquelme greatly to get important appointments in the adelantamiento of Murcia.<sup>84</sup>

Constant armed conflict between Christians and Muslims from the Nasrid kingdom of Granada made the border a highly unstable place.<sup>85</sup> Added to the internal battles in the kingdom and the battles against Muslims on the southern border, a climate of 'general militarisation' spread throughout the territory during the fifteenth century. In medieval Europe, and mainly in the Iberian kingdoms, the border enhanced the role of the warrior and developed a war economy. This ended up generating wealth through the frontier activities and created opportunities for social promotion and a redistribution of property that enriched some and impoverished others.<sup>86</sup>

The reconquest marked the constant redrawing of the border at the time. For example, during the first half of the fifteenth century, the area that went beyond the municipal limits of Lorca (the lands of Baza, Huéscar, Guadix and the valley of Almanzora) became geostrategic locations.<sup>87</sup> The conquest of all forts and walled cities meant progress for Christians over Islam and a meaningful impulse towards the final objective of conquering Granada.<sup>88</sup> In 1435, Alonso Yáñez Fajardo II conquered the strategic rearguard and also forefront plaza of Huéscar, La Sagra, which brought him great prestige in the conflict of Christianity and Islam.<sup>89</sup>

The death of Alonso Yáñez Fajardo in 1444 generated strong internal conflicts in the lineage, and as a result the loss of the already conquered locations and the retreat of the border to the limits of 1430, with the exception of Xiquena.<sup>90</sup> The title of adelantado went to the first-born son of Alonso Yáñez, Pedro Fajardo. However, Pedro's cousin, Alonso Fajardo 'el bravo', claimed possession of the same title. As a continuity of the lineage disputes that had been common since the late medieval period, this resulted in yet another open battle between the family factions. This time the disputes emerged within one lineage, but such a civil-war type of conflict between 1440 and 1461 marked a slackening in the ongoing effort to conquer Granada.

The disputes between the Soto and the Riquelme families in the sixteenth century could well have their origins in the intrafamilial conflict that took place within the Fajardo lineage. The Soto faction was closer to Alonso Fajardo el bravo's cause.<sup>91</sup> Diego de Soto, comendador of Moratalla, led the opposition against Pedro Fajardo, though it was rapidly repressed. The peace signed in 1449, which the crown mediated, was over when Fajardo 'el bravo' left Murcia to defend Lorca from Muslim forces at the Granada border. The battle between his troops and the Muslim forces ended with victory at Alporchones in 1452, where the followers of Pedro Fajardo did not respond to his call for help. It was, however, Diego Riquelme, son of Francisco and Isabel Gómez Dávalos, who assisted John II in the battle.<sup>92</sup>

This is evidence of the ambiguous position that the Riquelme family adopted inside the Fajardo lineage. Depending on the political context and the events happening at the time, they would be closer or farther from the head of the lineage who was then holding the main position in the kingdom, the adelantamiento.<sup>93</sup> In their actions there was always the conviction that by serving the Castilian monarchy they would advance their social and political position.

With Alonso Fajardo in exile in 1461, the Riquelme strongly supported the adelantado Pedro Fajardo. The disputes between the Soto and Riquelme groups were a continuation of the battles between factions generated by the conflict between Alonso Fajardo el bravo's supporters and those supporting for the adelantado mayor Pedro Fajardo.<sup>94</sup> The jealousies of the late medieval era between the Soto and the Riquelme families was resurrected in the early modern period.

In favour of his infant brother Alfonso, Pedro Fajardo supported the nobles who dethroned Henry IV in the mock ceremony of Ávila in 1465. When Alfonso died in 1468, this group of nobles did not recognise Henry IV as the rightful monarch. The same ambiguous position was present in the Riquelme lineage in a client group of the Fajardo (led by the adelantado Pedro Fajardo), through the figure of Alonso Riquelme, brother of Diego Riquelme.

Alonso Riquelme served king Henry IV as captain in the reapture of Cartagena, which was in the hands of Don Beltrán de la Cueva. Diego Riquelme helped to counteract the de la Cueva uprising as captain of another enterprise. The monarch honoured these acts by designating Alonso Riquelme alcaide of the Castle of Cartagena, and granting him the administration of censales

perpetuos of the Order of Santiago, as stated in the royal provision.<sup>95</sup>

The Riquelme knew exactly how to design their political strategy and play their cards. On one hand, they got closer to the adelantado that held the kingdom's political power and maximum authority. At the same time, this lineage resented any kind of royal intervention in Murcian territory. On the other hand, they continued supporting the Castilian monarch, knowing that by serving the crown in military matters, they would end up achieving their ultimate objective of bringing the lineage to the highest social level and being part of the court.

In the conflict of crown and nobility, the Riquelme knew not to choose completely one or another side – it was better to play their hands and gain the most benefit for the family group. This allowed the Riquelme to introduce themselves into the regional nobility groups to obtain señoríos and to accumulate land, the source of both power and wealth.<sup>96</sup> As a result of the ascending trajectory in the political, economic and social spheres, Diego Riquelme became first lord of Santo Ángel.<sup>97</sup> This was a group of both campo and irrigated lands in Murcia, a formation dated to the mid-fifteenth century that became linked to the Riquelme through the mayorazgo.<sup>98</sup> The benefits gained by the group's socio-political strategies, which were already notorious in the fifteenth century, became even greater with the establishment of the Catholic monarchs.

The main goal of the new monarchs was to push for the definitive conquest of Granada. To obtain a bula de cruzada from the Papacy that would endow the enterprise with prestige and also cover the costs of war, the monarchs argued that they were fighting the infidel.<sup>99</sup> The strategy was formed by a number of initiatives to end the permanent Muslim threat. The main nobility lineages saw the Granada campaigns as a chance to promote themselves socially.

The border, the dividing line between Islam and Christianity, was the geographic space where more promotion and upward mobility processes through war took place in the last decades of the fifteenth century. The medieval mentality of war as something that ennobles was clear in European kingdoms at this time, and the case of the Riquelme family is a good example of this phenomenon. At the beginning of the Castilian initiative over the border, starting in 1480 Christians advanced successfully, particularly in 1488–9 with the conquest of Huéscar, Huércal-Overa, Vélez, Vera and Baza.

Pedro Riquelme, second lord of Santo Ángel, served the Catholic monarchs in the conquest of Baza, where he was taken captive.<sup>100</sup> His cousin, Martín Riquelme represents the clearest example of the advance of the lineage under the rule of the Catholic monarchs. He was paje and coperio mayor of Ferdinand and queen Isabella – thus being the first in the lineage who connects directly with the court and its space of influence and power. A rigorous marriage strategy, explained in detail in chapter two, explains this better.

Martín Riquelme served the Castilian crown in the campaigns of Portugal and Granada as capitán de lanzas. He participated, taking the city of Alhama when he defeated the Muslim troops in the villa of Aledo around 1488. Afterwards he was appointed regidor, procurador en cortes and alcaide of the villa of Ricote. For his appointments and battle triumphs the Catholic monarch called him Martín Riquelme 'el valeroso'. The sources also mention him as the head of the faction opposing the Soto lineage. The rise of the Riquelme during the reign of the Catholic monarchs was an added element to the mix that provoked the resentment of the Soto lineage against them. Martín Riquelme's brother was also paje for the Catholic monarchs, being gentilhombre and residing in the royal home, and he was also capitán de caballos in the wars of Granada.<sup>101</sup>

In this line of argument, it is worth emphasising Joseph Pérez's statement that 'the war in Granada was a way to mobilise the nobility around the sovereigns and to serve the state. Noble status was awarded to many soldiers who played a distinguished role on the battlefield. As in the heroic times of reconquest, war brought the opportunity of upward mobility and access to the privileges of the aristocracy. As in the era of the Cid, honour and wealth were granted at the time.'<sup>102</sup>

During the final years of conquest, this process took place more intensely in the border territory, which was usually depopulated. The awards by the concejo of Lorca in the frontier area were especially significant.<sup>103</sup> Concessions were given to individuals who stood out for their military character and their role in the reconquest. Such was the case of the Campo Coy census, which was first in the hands of the Fajardo in the time of the reconquest, and later, in the first third of the sixteenth century, changed hands to the Riquelme group after the sale and heredad (distribution) made by Alonso Yañez Fajardo 'el africano', bastard son of Alonso Fajardo 'el bravo'.<sup>104</sup> From then on, they constituted the property as a señorío connected to family property through the mayorazgo. In this way they became lords of Coy – Diego Riquelme was first lord of Campo Coy.<sup>105</sup>

The conquest of Granada ended the fighting on the border, and it also meant that noble families saw their patrimony augmented. Some of the new properties were the crown's reward for services rendered during war, and others came from purchases between private individuals. This is when noble landowners began consolidating their control and influence of the kingdom of Murcia. The expansion across the frontier and the accumulation of wealth, with the Riquelme family playing a large role in the process, was the preamble for the foundation of mayorazgos during the sixteenth century and throughout the early modern period.<sup>106</sup>

The four factors that allowed the completion of the establishment of the lineage system were thus clearly defined: first, the nobility disputes; second, the fact that Murcia was a frontier territory; third, the well-developed process of señorilización (consolidation of lordship); and fourth, as a result of the completion of reconquest, the immediate linking of land to family name through the creation of mayorazgos across the kingdom.<sup>107</sup> By the start of the sixteenth century, the imaginary of the elite with a clear lineage consciousness had been consolidated.<sup>108</sup> And all the glorious moments and events that occurred in war during the last phase of Christian reconquest contributed, throughout the early modern period, to nobles constantly boasting of their ancient lineage which had participated in the campaigns to conquer Granada from the Muslims.

Francisco Cascales, in his Discursos Históricos, described how the deeds were embodied in material culture, the writing of memorials and with shields and crests ornamenting nobles' homes and palaces.<sup>109</sup> And, as some scholars have pointed out in regard to this issue, these material elements demonstrate a shallow exhibition of the antiquity, honour, splendour and virtuosity of their lineage, all related to the good and pure blood inherited from their ancestors.<sup>110</sup>

The nobility increased both its social and economic power during the reign of the Catholic monarchs. Many nobles took advantage of the distribution of lands after the conquest of the kingdom of Granada.<sup>111</sup> 'All the grandes (old nobles), knights, and hijosdhalgo that served in the conquest of this kingdom', wrote a contemporary chronicler, 'received rewards of houses, land and subjects, depending on their estate.'<sup>112</sup> Most of the grandes benefited from the laws enacted in the court of Toro in 1505, when their right to mayorazgo was implemented and regulated.<sup>113</sup> And as John Elliott explains, the majority of the nobles chose not to become court nobles, but rather to live in their 'sumptuous palaces' and 'large land properties'.<sup>114</sup> The Riquelme were, however, an exception: they established themselves at court with the Catholic monarchs and all through the reign of Charles V. At the same time, they used the mayorazgo to link their extensive land properties to their family patrimony during the entire early modern period.<sup>115</sup>

1.3.2. Participation in the Campaigns of Italy and Africa: The Consolidation of Power

War in Granada shaped Spain's building of the modern state. It strengthened and provided the state with first-class armed forces that would immediately afterwards show their abilities in Italy.<sup>116</sup> This consolidated the power of Spain in Europe. The Granada enterprise brought the Catholic monarchs in Spain the chance to modernise its military, and to perfect its technical prowess and its equipment.<sup>117</sup> Gonzalo Fernández de Córdoba, the gran capitán (great captain) of the wars in Italy, learned his military tactics in the Granada campaigns.<sup>118</sup>

The conquest of Granada in 1492 allowed king Ferdinand to pursue more military endeavours. The invasion of Italy by Charles VIII of France led to a coalition of European forces to stop the French monarch. The Liga Santa (Holy League) was created in 1495 between England, Spain, the Empire and the Papacy, and in the words of John Elliott, the agreement marked a 'triumph of king Ferdinand's foreign policy'.<sup>119</sup> Since then, the Castilian monarch had established the foundations for a diplomatic system that maintained Spain's hegemony for a century. With the goal of blocking France by diplomacy, between 1480 and 1500, he established permanent embassies in Rome, Venice, London, Brussels and at the Austrian court.<sup>120</sup> The success of Spanish foreign policy was the establishment of a diplomatic network.

The Riquelme lineage became part of this dynamic through the experience of the appointments they held after the conquest of Granada. The group supported the crown's actions after the war. Cristóbal Riquelme, third lord of Santo Ángel, knight of the Order of San Juan became the ambassador to Rome. Charles VIII's invasion of Naples around 1495 made clear that diplomacy and military action needed to complement each other. Gran capitán Gonzalo Fernández de Córdoba led the Italian campaigns, and the Riquelme also helped in Italy – Luis Riquelme, father-in-law of Cristóbal Riquelme (third lord of Santo Ángel), was capitán de caballos in the wars of Naples.<sup>121</sup> The French were defeated in 1504 and the Spaniards became the official owners of Naples.

The Neapolitan campaign showed that, in the early sixteenth century, both the state's diplomacy as well as its military were now professional and thus two essential pillars of the modern state. The Riquelme were active on both fronts, which explains their social advance in the first third of the sixteenth century in a bonanza of benefits that most of the noble families experienced at the time. The power and prestige that each of the members of the group achieved through their individual actions, by participating in the campaigns, serving the king in the court, accumulating posts in the concejo, increasing their wealth by accumulating land, or by holding the crown's foreign diplomatic appointments, also helped the group to the top of the social hierarchy. There was a real group consciousness by then, of being part of the urban oligarchy, and through the group the individual was socially promoted. Without the group, the individual would not have enjoyed these benefits.

All of these factors helped the Riquelme maintain their place in Charles V's court as well. Lorenzo Riquelme Barrientos served the court of Charles V's brother, Ferdinand I of Habsburg, and he was Charles V's guardia mayor. Martín Riquelme 'el soldado' was paje of Charles V and also participated in his African campaigns of Algiers and Bougie.<sup>122</sup>

The analysis of all this trajectory, both at the political and the military levels, demonstrates that the Riquelme possessed high social prestige during the first half of the sixteenth century, and especially after they served in the military campaigns of the Castilian crown. After the wars in Granada and the victory of the Hispanic monarchy, the campaigns in Italy offered the group a new opportunity to rise. The group dignified itself through participation in diplomacy and military actions. The campaigns in Africa that followed, which were conceived as continuations of the reconquest, gave yet another chance to the lineage to show their position, though here the aggressive Castilian monarchy was not so successful.

The high number of appointments in the regidurías and also the position as regidores that Riquelme families held were relevant evidence of their social and political advance, and this tendency continued to rise as a result of their participation in the concejo during the reigns of the Catholic monarchs, Charles V and Philip II (see table 1.3 and graph 1.3). Throughout Philip II's reign the lineage was further strengthened as the crown faced economic stagnation by selling public office posts, and as the Soto lineage declined. This was the Riquelme's most splendid era, one of great power in the urban oligarchy (see figure 1.1).

2.1. Mixed Marriages between Christians and Jews: Struggles for Land Property and Sociopolitical Power (1550–1725)

The comunero revolt (1520) was a key moment in reviving and igniting the disputes and rivalries among different Murcian factions.<sup>1</sup> There was a clear continuity of the late medieval quarrels well into the early modern period, and these gained even more virulence during the sixteenth century in the context of the European Counter-Reformation.<sup>2</sup> The Hispanic monarchy was among the leading European Catholic monarchies creating all sorts of mechanisms to defend themselves and preserve the ‘true Catholic faith’ against the Protestant reform movement.<sup>3</sup> The mechanisms adopted in Spain were unique in comparison to other regions in Europe.<sup>4</sup>

The 1547 estatutos de limpieza de sangre (purity of blood statutes) implemented by Toledo’s cardinal-archbishop Martínez Silíceo were one example of what these mechanisms looked like. These statutes, which were clearly directed at those aiming for a position in the concejo (peasant community) to bear an hábito militar (military uniform), or to have a position in the Church, demonstrated the emergence of a new social archetype. Ultimately, it was a redefinition of the noble estate.<sup>5</sup> At this point, to have noble origins was no longer enough: another fundamental requirement was to be pure of blood. And purity of blood meant being completely free of Jewish, Muslim or Protestant ancestry. This really became the identifying element of purity among the Castilian lineages. The purity of blood statutes were unique and exclusive to the Iberian peninsula in the European context, and the elite in Europe firmly and clearly defended their ‘racial’ purity.<sup>6</sup>

In the Hispanic kingdoms, the cristianos viejos (old Christians) now competed with the cristianos nuevos (new Christians) – those newly converted who previously were of Jewish faith.<sup>7</sup> The reaffirmed and consolidated place of the old lineages that had participated in the reconquest (described in chapter one) reappeared with a new nuance in the sixteenth century. The concept of lineage, which emerged during the last decades of the medieval period, could then be described as bearer of all sorts of powerful and segregationist legal and theological provisions that had previously been advanced.<sup>8</sup>

In Mediterranean Europe, business, money and the purchase of nobility titles were the paths for newly wealthy families to upward mobility. The nobility, however, always met this advance with great resentment. This is why, as the purity of blood statutes were adopted in Spain, medieval factions reappeared during the comunero revolt. Signs of this continuity were the never-ending disputes among rival families, where the accusations of judaizar (Judaising) and of having a Jewish past translated into the idea of deuda de sangre (debt of blood), and the social sin<sup>9</sup> of those who had condemned Jesus Christ would be a key weapon used in campaigns and purges against opposing factions and individuals.<sup>10</sup> The conflict between nobility factions in southern Spain, in the kingdom of Murcia was fierce in the 1560s – the disputes of the Soto with the Riquelme lineages were good examples of such rivalry.<sup>11</sup> Members of these lineages, and especially those who fervently used the claim of purity of blood, could not have found a better tool to vilify, slander and attack the honour of an opponent than the Martínez Silíceo statutes. The number of cases submitted to the Santo Oficio (Holy Office), especially of Judaising, grew exponentially at the time.<sup>12</sup> Families coming from powerful groups of society instrumentalised the Inquisition with the sole aim of defeating adversaries.

The building and manipulation of genealogies with the goal of hiding any pinch of a Jewish past was the main objective for newly noble families. Members of these families had also acquired or purchased public office positions that the Castilian crown was freely handing out at the time.<sup>13</sup> A fundamental feature that defined the baroque man in Spain, and one that emerges at the end of the Renaissance as ‘immaterial capital’, was the protection of honour.<sup>14</sup> In the words of José Antonio Maravall, ‘honour is the award for doing what one is socially obliged to do.’<sup>15</sup> To damage and challenge his honour defamed a noble's social esteem, and the only way to reclaim his honour was by eliminating the person who had insulted it in the first place. Lope de Vega's Los Comendadores de Córdoba rightly explained it – honour is a social tool that one cannot get but that is provided by others.<sup>16</sup>

Competition for honour was tough. In the context of constant noble disputes, whoever bore more honours had more right to power. This explains the arduous and long time that it took to obtain honours in Spain in the early modern period, such as wearing a military uniform from an order (Alcántara, Calatrava, San Juan, Santiago or Montesa), having a role in leading a peasant or a clerical community, becoming a member of the Inquisition, belonging to a noble cofradía (brotherhood), or the highly regarded appointments in court or owning a noble title.

Other arrangements that contributed to building up prestige for lineages were redacting records of nobility, building chapels emblazoning the façades of palaces or seigniorial houses.<sup>17</sup> These engagements helped demonstrate that the family's past was full of honour and social reputation. All of this 'material culture' had a clear goal – to praise the lineage's past and show that the group had participated in the Christian crusade during the reconquest against Muslims.<sup>18</sup> The claim was a pretentious and shallow creation of their own past.

2.1.1. Revival of Old Factions and the Mediation of the Inquisition: An Old Conflict, Riquelmes versus Sotos, Fifteenth to Sixteenth Centuries

With the goal in mind of being close to the adelantado, the figure with the most political power in southern Castile and the kingdom of Murcia, both the Soto and the Riquelme groups knew they needed to be immersed in the Fajardo clientele. The personal mechanisms that defined feudal society were the modern version of the patron–client power relationships of the Renaissance.<sup>19</sup> The relationship between patron and client could be consanguinity-based or not – loyalty, solidarity, protection, and mutual aid were other types of linkages that bonded individuals and groups. The disputes among different factions in the kingdom of Murcia had their origins in the conflict between Alonso Fajardo 'el bravo', whom the Soto group supported, and the adelantado Pedro Fajardo, with whom the Riquelme family allied.

Members of the Soto group were mostly in leading positions of encomiendas santiaguistas such as Caravaca or Moratalla – Juan Martínez de Soto led, as comendador, the encomienda de Caravaca.<sup>20</sup> Since they were not so prominent in military positions as armed knights and those defending the crown at the border, the Soto group could not be at the level of the Riquelme during the reconquest period.<sup>21</sup> As opposed to gaining prestige by participating in military campaigns, the Soto group achieved social promotion through marriage alliances with the members of the main family line of the Fajardo lineage. The bond between the Soto and the Fajardo lineages had been marriage-driven since early on – Juan Martínez de Soto married the daughter of the adelantado Alonso Yáñez Fajardo, Beatriz de Soto, in the first third of the fifteenth century.

The Riquelme political strategies were directed in two directions, the adelantado and the crown, establishing allegiances and services with both institutions and positioning the lineage at a more prestigious level. This was a period of prosperity for the Riquelme, and their success progressively ousted the Soto group, resulting in the social stagnation of the lineage of the latter. After the clashes between the allies of Alonso Fajardo ‘el bravo’, who were eventually defeated, and those that supported the adelantado, a dichotomy of victors and vanquished was clear.<sup>22</sup> Suspicions, grievances and jealousies were now at the forefront of the conflict between the two factions.

The factions that triumphed wanted to advance and crush the adversary for ever, and those who ended up as second-level individuals would do anything to raise their position. This was common in the warrior ideology of a European frontier and continuously warring territory like the southern Castilian kingdom of Murcia at the time.<sup>23</sup> Late medieval factions and their constant clientele disputes for power and control lasted through the early modern period as well, and even intensified during the second half of the sixteenth century.<sup>24</sup> The special geopolitical location of Murcia – as with other cities located in the Mediterranean area – aggravated these disputes and armed conflicts even more.<sup>25</sup> Michèle Benaiteau and Gérard Delille have studied these conflicts and the emergence of factions in France and Italy.<sup>26</sup> In the Italian case, solidarity, fidelity and kinship were at the core of the connections between factions. Different factions were supported by parishes and brotherhoods, and they also had family ties bonding one faction to another. However, when disputes and rivalries arose, generally as a result of holding political positions which entailed more authority, the conflicts and battles were 'all against all'. When disputes emerged within a family, and even among different factions or families, everyone ended up being involved in a sort of global amalgam of struggle and conflict – 'io contro mio fratello, io e mio fratello contro mio cugino, io, mio fratello e mio cugino contro il mondo!'<sup>27</sup>

The Italian faide was a system of factions and clientele similar to what existed in Castile. It was an institution: a social organisational reference of behaviour, conduct and responsibility norms in regard to the adversary. It delimited the groups and defined social relationships, and it became the system to resolve disputes.<sup>28</sup>

Throughout most of the sixteenth century, rivalries and conflicts became more aggressive among the lineages in the kingdom of Murcia.<sup>29</sup> Though there were some quieter periods throughout the century in the Crown of Castile, the first ten years of the 1500s, the years following the comunero revolt (1520–4)<sup>30</sup> and the decade of the 1560s were especially violent, and heresy accusations resurged as the most important weapon to slander the adversary. Between these periods, the different factions contained their battles, and although they were generally peaceful years, any minor dispute could revive the conflict. In addition, as factions used everything to hand to gain and control political power, the social context was extremely unstable.<sup>31</sup>

Memorials were created in the midst of these conflicts all over the Iberian kingdoms, and as they show in the case of Murcia, there were violent disputes between the two factions in the beginning of the sixteenth century. In one of these confrontations, 'the [direct] niece of Matias Coque Riquelme amputated the nose of an honest and well-connected Murcian hijodalgo.'<sup>32</sup> Disturbances were common between important families in the city of Murcia, 'the mortal passion between old and known factions, the Riquelme and the Soto groups; the faction leader of the Riquelme was Mathias Coque Riquelme, grandfather of Mathias Fontes.'<sup>33</sup>

Regidores Martín Riquelme (also leader of the faction against the Soto group) and Pedro Soto were dismissed from the concejo or peasant community meeting after they exchanged a battery of insults.<sup>34</sup> On Monday 17 August 1506, the regidor Pedro de Soto and his brother Francisco were attacked and injured by members of the Riquelme family.<sup>35</sup> These purges, at times extremely violent and tense among both lineages, went on for most of the sixteenth century.

When the Riquelme reached the top of the kingdom's power pyramid through their sociopolitical strategies, combined with the Fajardo lineage, the comunero revolt was the perfect excuse for the Soto group to resuscitate their battle against the Riquelme lineage and place themselves with the party that opposed the marquis of Vélez.<sup>36</sup> After the comunero revolt, the wedge between the factions continued to grow in southern Castile. During the 1540s, both parties continued to disagree as to what role the marquis of Vélez, who was separating himself from the king, would have in the city government.<sup>37</sup> The Soto group rejected the right of the marquis to govern the city, and the Riquelme defended it.<sup>38</sup>

John B. Owens explains that the violence and tensions that Murcia experienced as a frontier region were inherited from the late medieval period, and that this legacy also accounted for the ferocity and intense violence of the conflict between factions during the early modern period. And, as in the Italian kingdoms, the purges can be defined as intrafamilial disputes, all factions being connected through family ties.<sup>39</sup>

2.1.2. The Role of 'Blood' in the Conflicts: The Adoption of the Martínez Silíceo Statutes

After the preaching of the Franciscan friar Vicente Ferrer and a decree of the late fifteenth century by the Catholic monarchs mandating expulsion of anyone who refused to convert to Catholicism, there was a massive wave of conversions to the Catholic faith.<sup>40</sup> As a result, the cristianos viejos (old Christians), and especially the nobility in this group, suddenly were bearers of key, positive cultural and ethnic elements that distinguished them from those of Jewish descent who had just converted to Catholicism, the cristianos nuevos.

Such differentiating elements became fundamental in Spain in the sixteenth century, and even more so as Protestant reform advanced through Europe, making Catholic monarchs across the continent adopt their own defensive mechanisms against this 'danger'. Cristianos viejos knew very well that they needed to redact rules and statutes that defined purity of blood so as to distinguish them from cristianos nuevos.

Awareness of sangre divina (or divine blood), of having ancestors going back to the tribes of Israel, made converted Jews feel privileged within the social body of Christians. Gutiérrez Nieto says that converts were the yeast that boosted the development of the Christian bourgeoisie.<sup>41</sup> Hence the focus on the urban character of the Jewish community. Julio Caro Baroja emphasises that the converso is generally part of the bourgeoisie, both because he lives in the burgo or city, and also because he is part of an emerging middle class that belongs to the middle levels of the business and financial worlds.<sup>42</sup> The Jewish conversion gave the cristianos nuevos access to professions formerly prohibited, such as positions in the administration (secretarías, secretaries; escribanías, notary offices), in the cabildo catedralicio or council of the cathedral (canonjías, deanatos) or in the civic council (regidurías).

With their new social status, Jewish converts to Christianity began to access positions that were previously denied to them because of their religion – conversions had an immediate impact in the processes of social mobility within the group of cristianos nuevos. This social sector, wealthy through business and capital accumulation, now attempted to be level and assimilated with the old nobility. They followed a ‘reconversion strategy’ by trying to be included among the ruling elite.<sup>43</sup>

Juan Hernández Franco has thoroughly studied the social trajectories of the conversos in the Murcian elite of southern Castile. He highlights the ‘steepening’ social trajectory that occurred in the heart of the Santesteva-Lara family.<sup>44</sup> With judeoconverso origins, the family, during the first half of the sixteenth century, rose up to the level of the old urban oligarchy. This allowed them into relevant ecclesiastical and civil positions such as canonjías or regidurías, and their trajectory is critical to understanding the end of the conflict between the Riquelme and Soto families.

Historians have documented this upward mobility of the cristianos nuevos, and their assimilation in the nobility brought deep resentment among the old urban oligarchy of Castilian communities.<sup>45</sup> These tensions were at the centre of the revived conflicts and disputes among the Murcian factions. The marriage of Beatriz de Soto y Diego de Lara became the perfect excuse that the Riquelme used to vilify the honour of the Soto lineage, which was now stained by the de Lara’s Jewish ancestry. The Riquelme adopted a number of discrediting strategies – namely the infamous charges of being a converso judeizante – when the crown created positions for them in 1543 and 1544.<sup>46</sup> The opening of positions permitted cristianos nuevos access to regidurías, and they then sided with the Soto group. Their rivals would fight so that this favouritism did not spread through Murcia's public life.

This is why the establishment created ways to maintain their traditional structure, as evidenced by Juan Martínez Silíceo, soon to be cardinal-archbishop, when he wrote the purity of blood statutes while he was the bishop of Murcia (1541–6). Purity of blood became in Spain the differentiating trait.<sup>47</sup> Martínez Silíceo referenced the New Testament, e.g. Matthew (23:4) and Paul, who differentiated Jews from Gentiles – ones who embraced the true faith while the former were hidden in 'a world of darkness'.<sup>48</sup> The interpretation of biblical texts was often wrong and malicious enough to justify ethnic segregation of those who had converted.<sup>49</sup> The Dominican Agustín Salucio later and rightly stated in a popular publication<sup>50</sup> that both factions hid behind the purity of blood statutes. Slanders accusing the opposing lineage, no matter how pure that lineage was, darkened and vilified for ever.

Such procedure was the common, most destructive way to settle conflicts among 'factions and partialities' in each place. Many enriched themselves only by cleaning or staining lineages. The Dominican friar Domingo de Baltanás argued in Apologías sobre ciertas materias morales en que hay opinión, which appeared in 1556 in Seville, that the purity of blood statutes were the seeds of the 'discord of the lineages'.<sup>51</sup>

The nobility used the purity of blood statutes to contain the new social sector that had become wealthy, was seeking to gain positions of power and become part of the ruling elite.<sup>52</sup> The role of blood was central to this social inclusion in an already stratified and caste-based ancien régime society.<sup>53</sup> Bartolomé Bennassar has documented in detail these clashes between factions. The resentment and envy that emerged towards families that were advancing on the social ladder were notorious. In the case of Andalucía, Bennassar showed, 'la plupart des affrontements se produisent entre une famille prééminente, parfois reconnue comme noble avant les autres, et une famille montante, dont la première entend freiner l'ascension.'<sup>54</sup>

As mentioned earlier, the marriage of Beatriz de Soto and Diego de Lara was the turning point for the disputes between the Soto and Riquelme factions to become violent. The factions used the Tribunal de Fe (Court of Faith) to launch the crossfire of allegations about judaizar that had the sole purpose of defeating the adversary. Jaime Contreras closely traces the battles where the Murcian elite were ascribed to one or the other faction.<sup>55</sup> Their goal was to find out why Francisco Riquelme had been made clérigo de menores, and this is what revived the hatred between the family factions.<sup>56</sup>

Attacks between families of different lineages intensified with the establishment of the purity of blood statutes in the sixteenth century.<sup>57</sup> Around 1560, the noble cristiano viejo was the social archetype. To assault his personal and family honour was the key to vilifying the adversary. Many of the cases before the Chancillería (regional court) in Granada were attempts to prove noble origins and to erase any drop of spurious blood. One such case involved the regidor Francisco Guil, connected to the Riquelme lineage, who had accused Doña Inés Coque and her children of having blood stained by Jewish ancestry.<sup>58</sup> This is evidence of the intrafamilial conflicts at the heart of the disputes between factions – the Guil, Coque and Riquelme families all belonged to the same family group and were closely related.

Accusations of Jewishness between factions also emerged in the disputes to control municipal power in the Iberian kingdoms. During the second half of the sixteenth century, when the coffers of the Hispanic monarchy were depleted, the selling of positions of public office increased. Taking advantage of the situation, the emergent bourgeoisies used these appointments to move upwards and became equal to the nobility. In the kingdom of Murcia, this process of upward mobility aggravated the ongoing frictions. An example of the tension was Macías Coque Riquelme's attempts to prevent the entry of Luis de Ceballos, a wealthy merchant and trader who belonged to the Soto lineage, into the regidurías of the concejo. The commentary suggested that money had made a convict into regidor.<sup>59</sup>

Older families of Murcia like the Pagan, Riquelme, Guil and Coque railed against purchased appointments in regidurías and other positions in the cabildo catedralicio. For them, money was not the only problem; the legitimacy of these appointments was also doubted because the holders were perceived as individuals with stained blood. On the opposite side, those closer to the Soto lineage such as the Lara, Valibrera, Ceballos and Bustamante had acquired trades and positions in office by an important process of upward mobility. During this time of inquisitorial furore in Castile, they remained silent and fearful, just hoping that the very active threats, which were the result of the passing of the statutes of the purity of blood, would gradually dissipate.

It is worth noting that the families from each faction or linaje-patrón line were also connected with each other. The social groups that were disputing access to power were therefore actually related to each other, which brought up a dialectic situation and deep contradictions deeply embedded in the Spanish baroque world. It even seemed as if they preceded what happened in the dawn of the Renaissance.<sup>60</sup> The purges of everyone against everyone turned into fierce conflicts within lineages, and the mechanisms they designed to safeguard their illustrious noble heritage ended up rebounding on them.

The Valibrera family was one of the families from the opposite faction with whom the Riquelme had family ties.<sup>61</sup> At the end of the fifteenth century, Luis Riquelme married Catalina de Valibrera Ceballos, and a century later Inés Riquelme was Juan de Ceballos y Bustamante's wife.<sup>62</sup> Around the same time in the mid-sixteenth century, Diego Riquelme de Comontes (third lord of Coy) married Isabel de Bustamante; and Pedro Riquelme (second lord of Santo Ángel) married Constanza de Arroniz in the late fifteenth century.<sup>63</sup> The Santo Oficio condemned both the Bustamante and Arroniz surnames in the sixteenth century – Catalina de Arroniz was relajada (taken to the civil authorities) in Murcia in 1560, Isabel de Arroniz was reconciliada in 1554, and Diego Arroniz was disqualified from public office appointments and fined 4,000 maravedies.<sup>64</sup> The Bernal and the Avilés also had strong family ties with the Riquelme and were equally convicted by the inquisitorial authorities.<sup>65</sup> Ana de Avilés Bernal, the daughter of Constanza Bernal and Diego Riquelme de Avilés, and spouse of Cristóbal Fontes de Albornoz, was also processed and accused as judaizante during the acts of faith that were carried out in the 1550s and 1560s.<sup>66</sup>

No one seemed to be free from the danger of the flames of the Spanish Inquisition, not even renowned families like Riquelme. The mechanisms that the older nobility had put in place, like those derived from the tough estatutos de limpieza de sangre, looked as if they were turning against them. In pursuing ties with noble families, the Riquelme had, by the beginning of the sixteenth century, already acquired enormous socioeconomic potential with the objective of uniting great family properties and attaching them to the lineage through the creation of mayorazgos.<sup>67</sup>

In order to erase the stain from the past and to safeguard their name as an honourable family, with all the political and economic strength that an important lineage entailed, the solution was to block any adversary's access to power. The Riquelme lineage hoarded all the power by seriously slandering the opposing family as a lineage with a Jewish past, and also making use of their wealth. To establish itself in the community, in the res publica, as a clean, illustrious and powerful family, the Riquelme's ultimate goal was to eliminate, defeat and defame the opposite faction. The main objective for the Riquelme group was to prevent the Soto family from having any control of power by cutting all access to positions in public office. To do so, to remove the adversary from the concejo, the Riquelme used an efficient tool, the Santo Oficio.

The focus of the disputes was to achieve the greatest number of pockets of power.<sup>68</sup> The intrafamilial conflicts were even greater because of it, and especially during the power vacuum that the marquis of Vélez left when he was attending to foreign affairs issues and wanted to be closer to the Castilian court. The jurado Francisco Guil, close to the Riquelme lineage, suggested to the concejo that the cabildo updated their ordinances about the limpieza de sangre of the officials, just as the cabildo of the cathedral had done in 1544.<sup>69</sup> Guil argued that it was 'because the city has an ordinance that the officials are clean and cristianos viejos, that ordinance has to be put in place'.<sup>70</sup>

The Riquelme linaje-patrón was slowly establishing its power over the Soto's. The 1560s was the most violent and bloody of decades, all due to the strong tensions between the lineages, which were worse than ever. The misrepresentations, false accusations and the clashes in the public space led to overcrowded inquisitorial jails and to extremely intense Santo Oficio pyres.<sup>71</sup>

In 1561, regidor Macías Coque Riquelme called for royal justice to end the clashes, straight after two jurados close to the Riquelme group had been assassinated.<sup>72</sup> The violence in the streets of Murcia continued between the two factions, and around the same time three members of the Riquelme lineage were detained: Gerónimo Riquelme, Pedro Riquelme and Cristóbal Bustamante.

In 1562 the Alto Tribunal gave orders to cut their hands off, and this provoked the rage of the Riquelme group against inquisidor Manrique.

From this moment onward the Riquelme regrouped against their enemies through the Santo Oficio, and inquisitor Manrique usually favoured their claims. Such an alliance meant the definitive collapse of the Soto group. When the Jewish past of the Lara family was proved and confirmed, the inquisitorial tribunal ordered their bones to be exhumed and burnt in public.<sup>73</sup> The public show meant the permanent condemnation of the Lara name, and as a result also that of the Soto family. Between 1560 and 1564 renowned members of the Lara family blazed in the flames of the Santo Oficio, and thus the Soto's aims to be part of the ruling elite never came to fruition.<sup>74</sup>

Members of the Riquelme linaje-patrón such as Francisco Guil, Rodrigo Pagán, Pedro Riquelme and Macías Coque met with the visitador del Santo Oficio to establish a new relation with the tribunal and the great families of Murcia.<sup>75</sup> The cédula that Philip II signed in 1567 declaring a royal pardon ended this conflict.<sup>76</sup> Riquelme members that had been convicted as a result of the disputes and public accusations were pardoned and reincorporated into public life. The pact for reconstruction that the Murcian oligarchy had elaborated was then ratified. Also, clear evidence of the victory of Riquelme over Soto was the appointment of Riquelme members in familiaturas of the Santo Oficio, which the Riquelme efficiently used to defeat the opposite faction. Macías Coque Riquelme was appointed familiar of the Santo Oficio on 30 March 1570, and around the same time Nofre Riquelme was also given the position.<sup>77</sup> The Tribunal de la Fe joined forces with the Murcian oligarchy and together they created an extremely strong social power structure.

The Riquelme were on top, with no competition, of the political power ladder after the defeat of their long-time rival, the Soto lineage. During the reign of Philip II, they gathered even more regidurías – nine in total, more than in previous years (see chapter one, graph 1.3). Their control was deep, and it continued to increase. In the public sphere and the community, the noble Riquelme were now seen as the illustrious lineage with old, clean blood running through their veins against the defeated faction, the Soto lineage, that bore impure blood.

2.1.3. Accusations of being Jewish within Elite Families

2.1.3.1. Links to the Robles-Muñoz Family

After the conflict between factions ceased in the last third of the sixteenth century, Murcian society seemed to live in a state of calm. The fury of the Santo Oficio against any sign of heresy, which had resulted in massive autos de fe, began to decrease as it was clear that the inquisitorial system in place was in fact damaging the pillars if not the actual buildings of Castilian society.<sup>78</sup> No social estate, and not even the ruling elite, was free from heresy accusations. The Spanish monarchy and some members of the elite, and also with the help of the Papacy in Rome, established a set of measures that ended the cruel conflict between factions. However, the end of the clashes was still far from reality.

Still, there was a time of calm from the 1570s and 1580s, and such relaxation allowed the hidalguización of a large number of wealthy families.<sup>79</sup> Some were dedicated to trade and business, and others focused on administrative and bureaucratic functions, which were originally attached to the Jewish community, and thus it was socially despised to hold these positions.<sup>80</sup>

A large number of families entered the ranks of the local elite and advanced socially by taking advantage of these empty positions, as they had done in the 1540s when the Castilian crown sold positions to refill their coffers. Such was the case of the Muñoz and Robles families, ascribed to the local caravaqueña bourgeoisie, who became wealthy doing business and trading, and later were appointed scribes, lawyers or secretaries. Juan Robles, from Caravaca, was the escribano mayor of Caravaca in the mid-sixteenth century.<sup>81</sup> The Muñoz family remained in Murcian territory through landownership all the way to the border with the kingdom of Granada. Don Juan Antonio Muñoz y Díaz, for example, settled in the city of Baza and held the position of lawyer in the Reales Consejos.<sup>82</sup> They followed a process of upward mobility by entering the nobility and acquiring status and prestige at a high sociopolitical and economic level. They held important appointments in the concejo. For example, Francisco Musso Muñoz was the alférez of Caravaca and Diego Robles, brother of Juan Robles, took one regiduría in the concejo.<sup>83</sup>

In order to continue increasing their status in the local oligarchy, the Muñoz family allied with the Riquelme through marriage. María Riquelme y Arroniz married Juan Pedro Muñoz de Robles in 1621.<sup>84</sup> Both families joined their properties and thus both lineages became linked through the Robles's mayorazgo, founded on 15 November 1557 by Juan Robles in Caravaca, and the Muñoz's mayorazgo that Pedro Muñoz established on 7 March 1577 in the same location.<sup>85</sup> Through the union both families advanced, and also the Riquelme patrimony was consolidated, enlarged and made more permanent. This is the reason why the Riquelme covered the Jewish past of both of these families – Pedro Muñoz received the legitimization letter in Madrid on 28 March 1568.<sup>86</sup> The letter mentioned, however, the uncertain past of Pedro Muñoz and also the children he had had in an illegitimate marriage with Catalina Musso (single woman, not forced to be married). For this reason, he begged His Majesty to rehabilitate him so that he could receive his inheritance, and the king granted his plea. Still, the Spanish monarchy was going through multiple phases of a scarcity of money due to sequential bankruptcies, and it did not care to whom it gave royal mercedes (graces and grants).<sup>87</sup>

To hide the past, the property donation letter required the daughter of Pedro Muñoz, Doña Isabel, to 'marry a hijodalgo (noble) and of pure blood' since she was the offspring of an invalid marriage. There was, therefore, a quiet integration of these families cleaned of a Jewish past.<sup>88</sup> However, this was only possible when a family had acquired enough social and cultural capital and also when there was a will to erase questionable origins from public memory.<sup>89</sup>

The Castilian social establishment, as this section argues, came about through the institution of mixed marriages, which became a warranty for social integration.<sup>90</sup> A stained blood spread through the main pillar of the Riquelme lineage because of the union with such families, but on the other hand these families provided the Riquelme family the opportunity to enlarge their economic patrimony, which the tribunal of the Santo Oficio had reduced after the events in Murcia in the mid-sixteenth century. This process is also evidence of one of the greatest contradictions of Spanish baroque society. On one side, the nobility, through the estatutos de limpieza de sangre, was limiting the integration of the elite and the emerging social groups. On the other side, the traditional oligarchy, embedded in local power, was not isolated from the economic advance of the emergent groups, and they finally opted to join them.

As Marcel Mauss explains, this was a favour and gifting economy based on giving and receiving honours in exchange for socioeconomic compensation.<sup>91</sup> The emerging families provided the nobility with significant economic patrimony, which enlarged and consolidated the patrimony of the elite families. The elite provided the emerging families from the middle strata with social and honourable capital. In addition, by joining the old, illustrious lineages who had participated in the reconquest, the emerging families were able to hide or cover their possible Jewish past. The social benefit was mutual, a reciprocal relationship from which each group gained by receiving favours.

2.1.3.2. Links to the Fontes-Paz Family

At the end of the sixteenth century, during this period of relative tranquillity in the kingdom of Murcia, the local oligarchy regrouped. The narrowing of the ties between the Riquelme lineage and the Fontes can be understood in this context. The Fontes lineage were:

legitimate descendants, coming from the noble house of Fontanet that is located with the señorío of the town there that is close to the city of Marseille in the kingdom of France from where they came in the year 1150 to serve the kings so glorious with an enterprise of horses to assist the count of Barcelona Don Ramon Berenguer I and family and lord king James I to conquer the cities of Murcia and Origüela, in which recovery also Arnaldo de Fontes, grandson of the man mentioned, assisted . . . for the conquerors of the mentioned lord of Murcia there was a partition of lands and they became one of the settlers of the city of Origüela . . . The surname of Fontes also could be added to the coat of arms of the mentioned house, eight crosses of black blazes on a field of gold . . . since prince Recaredo, brother of the holy king Hermenegildo was married to Badda from the first nobility of the Goths, daughter of Fontes count of the Patrimonios . . . you are connecting with some great houses and with titles of those my kingdoms like the Vélez, count of Fuentes, marquis of Espinardo and others of the surname Miron Dueño from the noble house of Redoran, very old-established in the city of Origüela because mosen Pere de Fontes married señora Antonia Miron . . .<sup>92</sup>

There were other unions, like the one between Riquelme and Fontes, with similar backgrounds in the kingdom of Murcia. They all flaunted their illustrious heritage that descended from the northern Spanish kingdoms' participation in the reconquest. After the battle, king Alfonso X partitioned land and other properties among the victors, like Fontes in Origüela, eventually weaving together most renowned family names.<sup>93</sup> The ultimate purpose of the unions was socially to close off the noble estate and make it as impermeable as possible to the emerging social intermediate strata.

Like many other families of the Murcian oligarchy, the Riquelme group was ascribed to the clientele of the Fajardo, under the umbrella of the marquis of Vélez. During the mid-sixteenth century, however, and after the comunero revolt, the marquis's rule slowly distanced itself from ongoing events and from the political life of the kingdom.<sup>94</sup> Pedro Fajardo, third marquis of Vélez, was increasingly engaged at the court and also with the Castilian crown's foreign policy. Still, the families from the concejo of Murcia were never completely isolated from the marquis, resulting in an alliance of the Murcian oligarchy based on the union of the most renowned family names. The first example of this process in the case of the Riquelme and Fontes was the late sixteenth-century union between Isabel Pagán Riquelme and Nofre Fontes de Albornoz y Avilés.<sup>95</sup> From then on, and until the first third of the nineteenth century, the destinies of both names were closely related to the alliances and strategies that they forged based on marriage alliances.

In this context, the Riquelme strengthened their position in the oligarchy and established contacts and alliances with other illustrious family names like Bienvenud, Carrillo, Melgarejo, Puxmarín and Verastegui.<sup>96</sup> These names were at the heart of the region's social network of families – all of them registered an important social trajectory, not only at the local level, but they also allowed the Riquelme lineage to be in contact with families with a long-standing social record and influence at court, and also with powerful families who held important titles of nobility. The surname Fontes also rose significantly during the seventeenth century thanks to the continuous donation and selling of mercedes and graces by the Habsburgs. For example, on 23 March 1692, Macías Fontes Carrillo y Albornoz received the title of marquis of Torre Pacheco. The cost of the title was 572,500 maravedíes, and it nullified the title of vizconde of Alguazas that Macías had once held.<sup>97</sup> To serve the prince as a loyal subject and fine vassal was honourable and well seen publicly among noble families. In Empresas Políticas Diego Saavedra Fajardo explains that 'the role of the king is to give and measure his landownership not looking for his advantage, but the greater good, which is the real outcome of the riches. To some we give because they are good, and to others we give so that they are not bad'; and to those that served the king by honouring him, 'since he is the prince similar to God, who always gives everyone abundantly'.<sup>98</sup>

As the Fontes family received a noble title, endowing the lineage with great status and social prestige, the Riquelme benefited indirectly since they were loosely linked to the Fontes lineage through family ties. The Fontes lineage remained at court and was in constant contact with families from other territories who were also advancing their careers at court. They wanted to thrive and obtain privileges from the monarch.<sup>99</sup> A prime case was that of Baltasar Fontes Melgarejo, second marquis of Torre Pacheco, son of Macías Fontes Carrillo. He stayed at court as caballerizo of Charles II and later married Nicolasa de Paz y Castilla, born in the villa of Frejenal de la Sierra, on 8 October 1702 in the parish of San Sebastián in the villa of Madrid.<sup>100</sup>

The Fontes and Paz were two important families with high socio-political and economic power. Of different origins but similar social trajectory, they came together with the happy idea that the union was going to increase their social prestige and consolidate their honour as powerful, untouchable families. However, the request by Ventura Fontes Paz (son of Baltasar Fontes and Nicolasa Paz) to exercise a familiatura of the Santo Oficio uncovered a fifteenth-century inquisitorial case against the Jewish ancestry of the Paz family, which had provoked clashes and disputes between factions in the region of Extremadura.<sup>101</sup> The honour of the Fontes family was put under pressure as well since they had joined forces with the Paz and the Riquelme families – the brother of Ventura Fontes, Antonio Fontes Paz (third marquis of Torre Pacheco) was married to Francisca Riquelme y Buendía, herself a member of the main family of the Riquelme lineage.<sup>102</sup>

These events were revivals of the cruel disputes that had occurred between factions during the sixteenth century in the Iberian kingdoms. The honour of illustrious families with a remarkable past like Fontes and Riquelme was stained and vilified when new clashes resurfaced in the nobility. The connections between some family groups and subgroups become visible in this process even when they were located in different places. Their destination, or common goal, was to be received at court. The union of the three (Fontes, Riquelme and Paz) was like a pyramid vertex with one edge expanding to Murcia and the other to Extremadura.

The criptojudío communities of Extremadura, from where many judeizantes groups appeared at the end of the fifteenth and during the sixteenth century, were located in many towns in regions like Frejenal de la Sierra, Mérida, Zafra, Alburquerque, Babajoz, Llerena and Jerez de los Caballeros.<sup>103</sup> The Santo Oficio strongly targeted and repressed these communities – which followed Mosaic law – from Llerena, the Inquisition's headquarters in Extremadura.

Many Jewish subjects opted for conversion after the measures that the Catholic monarchy implemented in 1492. Those who preferred to continue embracing the Jewish faith, however, had to go into exile to Portugal.<sup>104</sup> The closeness between Extremadura and the Portuguese border allowed a covert conversion of the Jewish communities as well – most of the conversos continued to practise Mosaic law, but to hide their Jewish past they simply 'mixed with cristianos viejos', and they also 'put forward declarations that proved they were cristianos viejos'.<sup>105</sup>

By the mid-sixteenth century, with the estatutos de limpieza de sangre in place and seeing the inquisitorial rage that had emerged in Murcia, it was clear that the lineages of 'old Christian blood' were not going to allow 'individuals with stained blood' (of Jewish ancestry) to hold high-rank postings in the concejo and the ecclesiastical cabildo. The disputes between factions in Extremadura were intense.<sup>106</sup> The passionate factional clashing, that had originated in the late medieval period, continued through the last decades of the sixteenth century, in the midst of the European and Spanish Counter-Reformation surge, when the accusations and calumnies of judaizar against individuals from the opposite faction were constantly made to dishonour them.

Nevertheless, conflict was not a 'continuum' feature of the famous lineages. There were some periods and in different places when and where clashes intensified. The conflicts among factions appeared and disappeared in the Crown of Castile in the seventeenth century, and were extreme in the beginning of the eighteenth century. Behind this process was the discredit of the adversary for the final defeat. The accusations of judeizar were always present before the Santo Oficio, however, to dishonour the opposite faction and exalt one's lineage in front of the inquisitorial tribunal.

The causes and the forces that pushed individuals from the factions to vilify opponents are better understood as a recurrence of old conflicts. The origins of this particular process are in 1722 when Ventura Fontes Paz applied to hold a familiatura in the Santo Oficio. After the application, there was a space/time breakdown – spacewise, there was a jump from the kingdom of Murcia to Frejenal de la Sierra (Extremadura), and in terms of time, there was a turning from the eighteenth back to the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Even before the evaluation process for the familiatura began, and before the investigation of his proofs of purity of blood had started, lords Gonzalo and Juan Antonio de Bolaños Paz, both sons of the marriage between Gonzalo Sánchez de Bolaños Maraver and Isabel María Paz de la Barrera, warned about the case for his familiatura – their marriage had been celebrated in the parish of Santa Ana de Frejenal de la Sierra on 17 January 1638.<sup>107</sup>

Their warning to those in charge of Ventura's proofs in the Santo Oficio was that they had heard from a related family member, Nicolasa de Paz y Castilla and mother of Ventura, about the proofs, and that there 'were going to be people that would try to darken our reputation'. They also announced the names of the individuals who would appear in the process, and who would try to stain the name because of animosities and disputes that they had had in the past. The names were Ignacio Rodríguez Pastrana, ecclesiastical judge of Frejenal de la Sierra; Francisco Moreno; Andrés Rodríguez Chacón and his son Diego Chacón; Matías Aguilar (presbítero); Ignacio José Rodríguez (lieutenant-priest of the parish of Santa Catalina); and Feliciano Rodríguez Tinoco (presbítero of Frejenal) and related to Aguilar and Rodríguez.

Gonzalo and Juan Antonio Sánchez de Bolaños declared that they were sons from their father's first marriage with Isabel María de Paz and not from his second marriage with Antonia Santander y Liaño, celebrated on 3 January 1657 in the parish of Santa Ana in the villa of Frejenal. The second union was the cause of all the conflict, and they stated: 'we regret the second marriage for having caused many enemies to us.’ They claimed to be descendants of the Paces de Salamanca family, who had come to the villa of Frejenal almost three centuries before in the person of Luis Álvarez de Paz, lord of the house and corrales of Antón Paz, born in Salamanca, and the first to settle in Frejenal. They used an illustrious genealogy to leave no doubt about their purity of blood (see Table 2.1).

To understand the trajectory of the family name Paz it is important to examine its relation to Francisco de Paz y Castilla, the maternal grandfather of Ventura Fontes Paz, who settled in the villa and court of Madrid and was paje of Charles II and the captain of horse in Flanders. Being at court, Francisco de Paz became acquainted with other renowned courtiers with similar surnames and established close ties with highly prestigious families that were already orbiting around the monarch. He married Ana Polizena Espinosa y de Paz at the church of San Martín de Madrid in 1672, which constituted endogamy, since it was a union between distant cousins. Together, they settled in the houses of Lope de Rioja, knight of Santiago, that were close to court.

Based on the sources about the interrogation, the surname Paz had a solid reputation in the villa of Madrid. The father of Francisco de Paz y Castilla, Francisco de Paz, visited the Order of Santiago, was conductor de Embajadores and resided in the parish district of San Andrés. As the questioning of Ventura Fontes's proofs in Madrid shows, this allowed him to be close to influential people at court, and he received friendship and favours from them.

All were high nobles and members of the clergy, and all of them favoured the noble past and purity of blood of the Paz name. They specially praised the qualities of Francisco Paz y Castilla and his father Francisco de Paz. Only one of those questioned, Gabriel García Izquierdo, born in Cuenca and residing in Madrid, knew some of the individuals with the Castilla surname who had postings in the Consejos Reales.

At the Murcian interrogation process, where the examiners looked into the Fontes surname, everyone was favourable to Ventura Fontes Paz, declaring the fame, nobility and purity of blood of the Fontes lineage. Some of the names listed as part of the questioning were renowned individuals of the Murcian urban oligarchy and from the cabildo of the cathedral, men like Roda, Ferro, Jordán, Belluga, Guerrero, Sandoval, Ceballos and Galtero. Such an attendance shows, once again, the social connection and the ties of solidarity and loyalty among the closed group of families of the nobility.

Most of the testimonies were from individuals either in public office, holding an ecclesiastical position or belonging to the Santo Oficio. The selection of interviewees was not random; it was intended to get a unanimous favourable decision.<sup>111</sup> It all looked as if the interests of Ventura Fontes Paz were going to be satisfied, and that once the purity of blood of the Paz and Fontes family names was demonstrated, there was not going to be any impediment for Ventura to obtain a familiatura of the Santo Oficio.

On the contrary, after all genealogies of the Paz family were examined, an additional, large list of penitenciados of the Paz name appeared. During this time, the process of Francisco Rodríguez de la Centena appeared as well – he was a ploughman, imprisoned in 1528.<sup>112</sup> His declaration shows that Frejenal was a municipality with a large majority of converso people, which meant that public office positions, many in the hands of the Paz family, had Jewish ancestry in their blood.<sup>113</sup>

Most of the decisions are from the end of the fifteenth century, just when the Jewish population was pushed either to convert to Christianity or to be expelled. It was also the period of the harshest inquisitorial processes, when the statutes of purity of blood were implemented following the growing reformist movement in Europe. Many of the members of the Paz family had Jewish blood because they had left exile in Portugal and had come back to Spain silently, faking conversion by adopting different family names, or by indiscriminately mixing with other families and names of pure blood so that they could hide their past.<sup>116</sup> Extremadura's geographical location on the Portuguese border allowed for this area to have a high number of inquisitorial processes in comparison to other regions in the Spanish territory.<sup>117</sup>

A Jewish individual by the name of Abbedey who came from Portugal and settled in Frejenal at the end of the fifteenth century was probably part of the Jewish population once expelled. He was baptised at the age of eighteen. Francisco de Paz, married to María Alonso, was his godfather, and Abbedey adopted the Paz family name. This led the community to believe that the surname Paz was infected in its roots by those who practised the Ley de Moisés. The process behind this one instance becomes more complex as the questions as to real purity of blood increase exponentially over time. The Consejo Secreto of Llerena on 13 February 1723 looked at the prosecution process in the cases from the Paz family name. The ones for Antonio, Arias and Gómez de Paz could not be found, though the one for Francisco de Paz was.

He was formerly named Francisco Sánchez de Montemolín and was a chemist and a surgeon. The cases of other processed conversos such as another resident of Frejenal, Fernando de Paz, or Ignacio Santander and Miguel de Bolaños, who had not been admitted as familiar of the Santo Oficio, all had close family ties to the large Paz family.

At first, the Consejo de la Inquisición on 9 July 1723 agreed for all the accumulated papers to be returned and that no one with the family name Paz coming from Frejenal was to be admitted when presenting a candidacy for the Consejo. As evidence, 'esta el suplicante con gran dolor que le resulta de la ditencion.'<sup>118</sup> The verdict was almost obvious, and things were not looking good on account of the stained past of Ventura Fontes Paz's family background. The splendour, the famous nobility and the long-time Christian blood from the most illustrious families – who had participated in the reconquest – of the Murcian oligarchy like the Fontes and Riquelme families were greatly threatened. To counteract the menace, they followed a strategy of actos positivos of members ascribed to the lineage – through reconstruction of the genealogical line they meant to find out if some of their ancestors had obtained proofs of membership under the most important communities of statutes.<sup>119</sup>

Although the Pragmática de actos positivos enacted in 1623 was invalid by the second half of the seventeenth century, the same kind of processes were being considered in the purity of blood cases. In some ways, it made the purity test more relaxed in regard to granting hábitos of military orders, familiaturas of the Santo Oficio and obtaining positions in the concejo or ecclesiastical appointments. First, there was mention of important individuals from distinguished positions and professions that were directly related to Ventura Fontes Paz. An extensive relation of surnames and family members from prestigious family names followed, though these rarely had any kinship relation with the candidate. Family names from illustrious lineages such as Bazan – like the admiral of Charles V's Armada, Álvaro de Bazan, or Guzman were mentioned – to show the familial and ancestral relation of the Paz family name with other families of important lineages.<sup>120</sup> The ultimate goal was to demonstrate, by all means necessary, the nobility and purity of blood that ran through the veins of the Paz family members.

Ventura Fontes's grandmother, Ana Polizena Espinosa y Paz, was the daughter of Inés de Paz Marmolejo and Agustín de Espinosa, governor of Berlanga, born and resident in Llerena and its regidor. The informants qualified Doña Ana for her family names, Espinosa from Frejenal and Marmolejo from Berlanga; anything to prove a justification to reaffirm Paz's purity of blood and obtain the famil-iatura of the Santo Oficio – since the opposite case meant a decline and collapse of the Fontes name without precedent.

Nevertheless, the case got blurred when some witnesses, after the start of the process, passionately declared the Paz family members' impurity of blood. The fear about certain lineage tensions being known was real – for example, Pedro Tinoco, born in Frejenal, resident of Aracena in the jurisdiction of Seville, and alférez de Infantería, pointed out that Nicolasa and Francisco de Paz were cristianos viejos, and of pure blood, but that it was known that there were some sambenitos of the Church of Nuestra Señora de Santa María de Frejenal, and related to Paz, that the Santo Oficio had sentenced before.

Feliciano Rodríguez Tinoco, presbítero of Frejenal, and Pedro's brother, contradicted his brother's declaration. He was against considering the proofs since he knew that many individuals related to Paz had been condemned and sambenitados by the Santo Oficio because they were Jewish. Feliciano became a true enemy of the Paz family after the clash with Gonzalo Rodríguez de Bolaños, who was ascribed to the Paz lineage. Feliciano publicly accused Gonzalo of judeizar – 'I don't keep the Mesías as you do.' Such disgrace needed to be erased; it was vilifying the Paz lineage.

A case of alcalde Gonzalo de Bolaños's was ongoing at the Audiencia Episcopal of Badajoz after he had revealed that the minister had brought some cerdos penados (sentenced pigs) on 8 October 1724. Ignacio Rodríguez de Pastrana, ecclesiastical judge of Frejenal, also accused the Paz name of coming from an impure lineage. The animosity between these two individuals came from a number of offences that Gonzalo Sánchez de Bolaños, as alcalde of the noble estate of Frejenal, had committed against his nephew Blas Márquez de Pastrana. Born in Frejenal, Diego González Chacón, presbítero vicario of the vicaría of this town, also voted against the Paz family as he competed for the position of mayor. An culminating the list of non-favourable declarations was the clash between Juan de Bolaños Paz and Manuel de Prado Basilio Casquete (already dead), when Juan said that he would 'fight him with fire' and Manuel responded that 'he was going to burn like him', accusing him on the central square of being Jewish.

The interrogation at Frejenal opened up conflicts between families that had become enemies a long time before. The Paz centre of the lineage constantly had to face the attacks that the Rodríguez lineage, favouring families of the villa of Frejenal such as Tinoco, Pastrana, Aguilar or Chacon, directed towards them. All of them accused the Paz family – and tried to find evidence of Jewish ancestry. In 1683, when Andrés Rodríguez Chacón was in the city of Jerez de los Caballeros at Pedro Lobo's house, he mentioned, in a decisive way, that even though his niece was married to Miguel de Bolaños in Frejenal and had a 'big nose', she was not Jewish because she had come from the mountains. The physical attributes that were mentioned often were racially and ethnically charged.<sup>123</sup> For example, Isabel Martínez, spouse of Rodrigo de Paz, was called la chamorra because of her tough facial features. Isabel Rodríguez, given her slim figure, was known as la holgada.<sup>124</sup>

The genealogical tree that the clergyman and resident of Frejenal Diego Arguello had created from the Inquisition books of Llerena shows that these individuals were accused of coming from, and had their origins in, Abbedey. The Santo Oficio had sentenced and relajado everyone in this genealogy. In parallel, the witnesses who were against the Paz family mentioned the three sambenitos of the lineage, one from the Paz surname, another from de Sardiña mill and the third from Diego Pacho.

Behind these accusations there was true hatred, envy and resentment between lineages of the urban oligarchy of Frejenal. The covering of the last names that were linked to the Paz faction – such as Sánchez de Bolaños, Santander y Liaño, Maraver and Castilla – those around the Rodríguez faction tried to vilify and stain the Paz name, which at the time was at the top of the local elite pyramid. As a result, accusations from within the Rodríguez faction emerged.

Baroque society, centred around orality, greatly emphasising public declarations. The constant trading of accusations between enemy factions generated long judicial processes, and to prove these cases was not easy. To counteract the attacks, the Paz family had secured favours from long-time parish priests and scribes – they were the handlers of all genealogical documentation that others with the intention of attacking their honour as cristianos viejos could use. For Bartolomé Ramos de Peralta, having the priest beneficiado Antonio González de Pina as a loyal friend was key – he was the oldest priest and also scribe of the cabildo of Frejenal.

Antonio González de Pina replied to the request for the oldest books in the parish archives by stating that he did not have them.

These might have demonstrated the precedence of the Paz family. Instead, he said that the oldest ones he had access to were the books of 1548. It was likewise with the testimony that Antonio de Paz, Alonso de Paz and Juan de Paz provided for missing instruments and protocols between 1556 and 1569 – that they were not at the escribanía – during the very time when many autos de fe had resulted in disgraced nobles' names from the local oligarchy.

Some witnesses declared that there had been two Paz surnames in Frejenal; one good and one bad. The good one had come from Salamanca and not left a succession – though it is possible that both names united to create the same family line, since what was important was to avoid the biological extinction of the lineage in such a reduced geographical space. The key was to have institutional, economic, social and political resources in the hands of the lineage – in public office (regidurías), in ecclesiastical institutions (canonjías), and by creating a patronato through founding obras pías such as the Monasterio de Monjas de Nuestra Señora de la Paz and the convent of the Society of Jesus (Compañía de Jesús). This showed how cristianísimo and pious the lineage was, and also the purity of their Catholic blood.<sup>125</sup>

Two important processes were in conflict at this point. On the one hand, the Paz lineage remained without heirs after the death of Francisco de Paz at the beginning of the sixteenth century. The only member of the lineage that was left was Abbedey, the grandson of Francisco de Paz. On the other hand, the accusations of judeizar that arose between factions and enemy sides might have been only the result of power envy. Covering the past and alluding to missing documents, however, could end up revealing a fake past – the ostentation and presumption of being cristianos viejos through a long list of actos positivos, and a stamp from the fundaciones pías as shown in Sancho Paz's testament (provided in 1536) and Antonio Paz's (registered on 25 November 1597).<sup>126</sup> These documents were provided to avoid any kind of infamous accusation and prove their Christianity, which also leads to the conclusion that the blood of the Paz lineage was indeed stained.

On the other hand, the commissaries at the Santo Oficio, after having qualified the surnames Espinosa and Marmolejo at the villa of Berlanga, and considering the noticias positivas (positive notifications) and the 'difficulty' of classifying the family name Paz – and there were ongoing suits between Feliciano Ortiz Tinoco and Gonzalo and Juan de Paz Bolaños, accused of judaizar – stated in Murcia on 18 April 1725 – that there was enough information to accept Ventura Fontes Paz as oficial of the Santo Oficio.

The questions about the Paz lineage were resolved and the Fontes and Riquelme lineages could continue to show off their purity of blood and the celebrity of the families with which they were mixed. The appointment as crucesignati or familiar was extremely honourable and prestigious, giving the Riquelme-Fontes the chance to continue blazoning their heraldic symbols during the eighteenth century. The search for cleanliness reached all branches of the lineage – the goal was to get all positive examinations and to avoid more tests. During this time in the Crown of Castile, almost all the consultations, even though they were done because of emerging rumours of impurity, resulted in positive conclusions and almost no calls for proofs.<sup>128</sup>

The crown responded flexibly to most of the instances, especially given the economic benefits of providing hábitos of military orders and familiaturas of the Santo Oficio to stop the draining of the royal coffers. The battle for power and the ambivalence of Spanish baroque society are phenomena that remained vivid and strong in the eighteenth century. Such ambivalence was the double face of Janus reflected in the position of the Castilian crown.<sup>129</sup> On one side, it was versatile to satisfy the traditional and old noble families that could have eased the economic crises, and on the other side, the crown was determined to maintain the social archetype of values established in the statutes of the purity of blood: 'además de ser noble se habría de ser cristiano viejo.'

2.2. Exhibition of Honour or Concealment of Impurity of 'Blood'? Affiliations to Military Orders, the Army and Regidurías

Belonging to institutions or enclosed social bodies, classified by the high nobility of their rank, allowed individuals in the Spanish monarchy to show off their honour, their purity of blood and their noble lineage. To wear an hábito of a military order (such as Santiago, Alcántara, Calatrava, San Juan or Montesa), to be a member of the Santo Oficio, to have a career in the army, or to belong to a noble brotherhood all bestowed status, distinction and social prestige.<sup>132</sup>

All institutions and social groups ran rigorous examinations of limpieza de sangre on the candidates. For the most part, social groups remained closed, though when the crown was in economic need, as during the reign of Philip IV and the appointment of count-duke of Olivares, there was more flexibility in granting hábitos of military orders.<sup>133</sup> During these times upward mobility was more evident, especially for the newly wealthy groups who could afford to buy a hábito, or for individuals whose merits on the battlefield earned their rise.

Members of the Castilian oligarchy craved obtaining honourable positions or titles. For the Riquelme lineage these were important to maintain their social status, enhance their house honour and avoid any sort of suggestion of stained blood. Beginning in the sixteenth century, and especially after the conflict with the Soto family, their most important goal was to build a glorious cursus honorum proof of their long-time ilustrísimo, nobilísimo and cristianísimo lineage. It was key to belong to certain social groups – the caballero de hábito represented the armouring of a Christian society, which became the model that individuals in lower social layers tried to reproduce.<sup>134</sup> The large militias of Alcántara, Santiago, Calatrava or Montesa had gained great prestige after the reconquest, and all military orders, especially the highest, Santiago, never ceased reminding of their role, on paper and in symbols, among those that defended Christianity.<sup>135</sup>

Besides the military orders, cathedral cabildos, concejos, Colegios Mayores, religious orders and the brotherhoods, all included limpieza de sangre examinations in their ordinances and constitutions for aspiring applicants.<sup>136</sup> The statutes became a mechanism for social enclosing: the way to verify the honour and quality of the candidates.

The presence of many Riquelme members in these institutions enhanced their cursus honorum. Also, marriages with prestigious families helped them preserve the nobility and purity of blood of the lineage. By the end of the sixteenth century, not many central members of the lineage wore hábitos. Cristóbal Riquelme de Arróniz (third lord of Santo Ángel), during the first third of the sixteenth century, wore the hábito of San Juan, by being comendador de Paradinas of San Juan, encomienda of the order located in Salamanca, and his son, Pedro Riquelme y Riquelme displayed the hábito of Santiago in the mid-sixteenth century.<sup>137</sup> Luis Riquelme y Avilés (fifth lord of Santo Ángel), nephew of Pedro Riquelme, was given the same precious hábito in 1588. Macías Coque Riquelme, son of Alonso Riquelme de Comontes (second lord of Coy) and Inés Coque, requested on 8 March 1559 to have the limpieza de sangre examinations to be knight of Santiago. Macías, however, died before the examinations started and before he could obtain the position he aspired to.<sup>138</sup>

The main families of the lineage, Coy and Santo Ángel, wore a much-reduced number of hábitos – only four in a century, while on average each generation wore one. Adding a collateral branch of the lineage, the Avilés family name, could have helped by adding some hábitos to the count.

The more family and blood ties, the higher the percentage of hábitos. In the seventeenth century there were unions with families like Fontes, Rocamora, Bienvengud, Salafranca, Melgarejo, Peraleja, Galtero, Tomas, Guil, Caro, Roca, Valcárcel, Puxmarín and Abad Sandoval, with diverse social trajectories that increased honours such as the wearing of a military hábito, and also allowed entry to the network of illustrious and titled families. The number of members from the Fontes lineage that became tied with the Riquelme lineage, for example, increased exponentially during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

Graphs 2.5 and 2.6 show that there was an increase in the number of hábitos in the hands of the Riquelme lineage and related families during the seventeenth century. It was the result of the Castilian

Graph 2.5 Membership of military orders by the Riquelme lineage and related families, sixteenth to eighteenth centuries

crown's need to sell gracias and mercedes during the reign of Philip IV, but also a consequence of the constant marriage alliances between the Riquelme and the Fontes lineages. The strategy focused on marrying within a close group of families of the urban oligarchy to increase the benefits from honours for the Riquelme lineage. This was done even with well-established families originally from the kingdom of Valencia, which allowed the Fontes lineage to increase the possession of hábitos of the Montesa order in the eighteenth century.<sup>140</sup> This increase in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries counterbalanced the limitations to concessions that Charles II implemented in the same way as Philip V's reign.<sup>141</sup>

As a result of the decrease in the availability of hábitos, the Riquelme-Fontes lost influence in the military orders of Santiago, Calatrava and Alcántara (see graphs 2.5 and 2.6). Although the percentage remained similar in the order of San Juan in the seventeenth century, and only slightly decreased in the Calatrava order, the Riquelme-Fontes lineage completely lost their presence in the illustrious and respected orders of Santiago and Alcántara.

By being related to the most illustrious names, the Riquelme were looking to imbue the lineage with symbols of nobility. And this was a difficult enterprise for the Riquelme, a burden that lasted through the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Marriage with important families was therefore essential, and this is how the lineage remained linked to noble families through the eighteenth century.

For example, Petronila Riquelme de Avilés, who made her will in 1613, was the granddaughter of Gonzalo Rodríguez de Avilés and Isabel Fontes, counts of Albatera.<sup>142</sup> The granddaughter of Antonio Fontes Riquelme and Claudia Carrillo Marín, Patricia Fontes Bienvenegud married, in the parish of San Miguel de Murcia on 2 October 1710, José Caro y Roca, born in Elche and living in Valencia, marquis of la Romana (title given by Philip V) and also made a holder of the hábito of the order of Montesa on 9 January 1725.<sup>143</sup> The marquises of Valdeguerrero, Gabriel Ortega, and María Josefa Sandoval y Guerrero, were the parents-in-law of the brother of Patricia Fontes, Antonio Fontes Carrillo y Bienvenegud y Arce.<sup>144</sup>

Within only one generation, the Fontes were able to gather a large number of military orders' hábitos. It was the children of José Caro and Roca y Patricia Fontes who entered the order of San Juan;

Antonio Ventura Caro y Fontes and José Caro y Fontes, alférez de Justicia del Regimiento de Dragones of Numancia, also wore the San Juan hábito.<sup>145</sup> On the same day, on 18 April 1757, the brothers Pedro Caro Fontes (marquis of la Romana), Carlos Caro y Fontes (born in Orihuela, capitán del Regimiento de Dragones of Batavia) and Pascual Caro y Fontes (born in Valencia) were vested as knights of the order of Montesa.<sup>146</sup>

The Fontes then became directly tied to the titled nobles of the kingdom of Valencia – those holding the marquisate of la Romana, and the Roca, in possession of the Malferit marquisate – and so did, indirectly, the Riquelme.<sup>147</sup> Francisca Riquelme y Buendía was married to Antonio Fontes Paz, third marquis of Torre Pacheco, and thus the title directly reverted to the Riquelme name in the mid-eighteenth century. Antonio Fontes (also second cousin of Fernando Melgarejo Puxmarín, who assumed the knight hábito of the order of San Juan on 4 July 1736), and Francisca Riquelme's first-born son Joaquín Fontes Riquelme, was fourth marquis of Torre Pacheco.<sup>148</sup>

Through the titles of nobility closely linked to the Riquelme-Fontes, they reinforced their noble position. Also, they were able to show, through genealogy, in the limpieza de sangre examinations, that they were related to higher noble families. The processes of Francisco de Borja Fontes Riquelme in 1771, and of his son Antonio Fontes Abad in 1797 were evidence of the strategy.<sup>149</sup>

Other individuals in the Fontes lineage, caballeros de hábito, alluded to their military career as a means to rise socially. In the eighteenth century, the militia honour was recovered after the Bourbon reforms. The army was, once again, 'a school of honour, strong arm and symbol of the patria'.<sup>150</sup> The militia was an honourable profession and thus it conferred honour on those who were part of it.<sup>151</sup> Such was the case of the Salafranca family, settled in Cartagena and wealthy because of commerce. Gaspar Salafranca was the first of his name to settle in Cartagena, and he was from Valencia.<sup>152</sup> The Salafranca–Riquelme link began in the seventeenth century through the marriage of Antonia Riquelme and Francisco Ignacio de Salafranca. The family's social upward mobility process was based on the military career of some of the members in the marine, especially between the late seventeenth century and throughout the eighteenth century. The social status of the family and its sociopolitical power increased as a result of their noble positions in the Consejos Reales. Then, in 1700, Bernardo Riquelme requested of His Majesty the title of marquis of Pinares – a title created that same year – and although he was denied then, in 1763 Bernardo Riquelme Salafranca y Rocha would purchase it for 330 ducados to be paid annually and the related expenses in the Spanish court and those needed to pay the caretaker and repair worker of the mayorazgos.<sup>153</sup>

It was not until well into the eighteenth century that the Riquelme family was fully part of the titled nobility. The marquisates of Pinares and of Torre Pacheco were the titles that provided the lineage with the most splendour and prestige during the eighteenth century.<sup>155</sup> These, however, were second-class titles that were acquired either through the Castilian crown's venality and its economic need, or because of favours among individuals with strong family ties who were in high relevant positions.

Other indirect or remote relations with the rest of the titled nobility helped Riquelme members to highlight and exaggerate their noble past as shown in the limpieza de sangre records for Riquelme and Fontes cases when they became regidor, when requesting a familiatura of the Santo Oficio or when seeking to be part of a noble brotherhood. The limpieza de sangre records of the marquis of Pinares's request for a familiatura of the Santo Oficio on 16 June 1788 listed both noble ancestors and related family members so that the already sentenced Manuel de Molina, regidor of Mérida, was not taken into consideration to dismiss his case. It is a sign of the flexibility of the eighteenth century regarding the honores and mercedes that the Consejo de Inquisición approved the gracia to the marquis of Pinares, Bernardo Riquelme Salafranca y Rocha Leonés Yuste Ponce de León, to be official minister of the Santo Oficio.<sup>156</sup>

After king Ferdinand VI granted Murcia an estatuto nobiliario in 1751, all regidores were required to be nobles, and only allowed in the position with favourable strict pruebas de nobleza.<sup>157</sup> Although these examinations were possibly common before, the first evidence is from 1751. The Riquelme-Fontes accumulated regidurías during the reigns of Philip III and Philip IV when the privatisation of positions, using the juro de heredad, was easily processed (see graph 2.7).<sup>158</sup> The Crown of Castile pushed for such a process, and also for the creation and selling of positions, which was extremely profitable and necessary to balance the economic deficit.

When Charles II succeeded, this process slowed down, and the number of Riquelme-Fontes regidurías also decreased (see graph 2.7). During the eighteenth century, there was an attempt to revive the accumulation of these positions, but it never went back to the tendencies of previous periods (see graph 2.7 and table 2.11). Under Charles III's reign, there were more Riquelme-Fontes regidurías, as well as other important positions such as alcaldes ordinarios, por el estado noble y de huerta, or like the case of Bernardo Riquelme Salafranca y Rocha (marquis of Pinares), who was both the procurador síndico general of Murcia and alcalde ordinario.

On 11 September 1758, José Fontes Barrionuevo, the civic council's regidor, declared officially that he gives, renounces and transfers his right to this position for the rest of his life to Don Antonio Fontes Paz, resident of Murcia, because he has the right qualities and these are the right circumstances that are required to be regidor, which he can hold for all the time he wants. And he asks His Majesty to approve this request.<sup>161</sup>

The king had the final right both to approve the transfer to Antonio, third marquis of Torre Pacheco, and also to terminate it. Appointing public office positions was a royal privilege.<sup>162</sup> Once the king approved, a civic council commission had to start the required hidalguía y limpieza de sangre examination process. For this, the candidate explained his illustrious, hidalgo and 'pure Christian blood' lineage through a genealogical display.<sup>163</sup>

It was Charles III who awarded the position of regidor to the marquis, by juro de heredad, and he began in the post on 26 October 1759. He paid 28,518 maravedíes for the position, for half its value and a third of its profits. Nine years later, Antonio Fontes Paz resigned, and his son Joaquín Riquelme y Fontes became regidor as well as fourth marquis of Torre Pacheco.<sup>164</sup> During this time also, between 1742 and 1762, Joaquín Riquelme y Togores, father-in-law of Antonio Fontes Paz, had the same position.

In 1771, Francisco de Borja Fontes y Riquelme, grandson of Joaquín Riquelme y Togores and son of Antonio Fontes Ortega, went through the limpieza de sangre examination process. Antonio was then judicially in possession of the title of regidor.<sup>165</sup> Antonio Fontes Abad, having passed the hidalguía examination, became regidor after his father Francisco de Borja Fontes died in 1797, though he never served in the position, and thus in 1801 he was given another title so that he could hold the post. One year before, his brother José María Fontes Abad had started on another regidor position.<sup>166</sup> Although decreasing in the reign of Charles IV, the Riquelme-Fontes continued holding many of the posts – their role in the sociopolitical sphere was far from over. Still, by the end of the eighteenth century, their influence in the Murcian concejo was significant, all because of the family ties they had woven with the oligarchy that served in the city hall.

2.2.1. Affiliation to the Holy Office and Noble Guilds: Santiago de la Espada and San Pedro Martir

The origins of cofradías or brotherhoods were diverse, but most were created around the idea of charity and infused with the principles of spiritual and social protection.<sup>167</sup> These organisations need to be understood in the context of the European Counter-Reformation – mainly to face Lutheran proposals. But most importantly, as these played an essential role, they are also a reflection of feudal, traditional Spanish society. Entry to some cofradías ultimately depended on social status.<sup>168</sup>

In the Castilian crown, nobility cofradías strongly defined their identities through social prestige, also establishing particular norms in a number of matters to define the moral and social profile of the possible candidates. The rules had an important role in social enclosing processes as well as in any kind of upward mobility. In addition, cofradías became ‘family clubs’, with ordinances that aided family recruiting.<sup>169</sup>

Rigorous limpieza de sangre examinations became part of cofradías by-laws to assure the illustrious noble provenance of all members. Limpieza de sangre interrogations were used widely in all kinds of bureaucratic bodies. Cofradías were organisations where these examinations were important, and particularly in the case of the Riquelme y Fontes. The Cofradías of Santiago de la Espada and San Pedro Mártir de Verona had had these names associated with them since their foundation. Members of the Riquelme and Fontes held key positions in these brotherhoods and they also used them to establish important family and social connections.

The hidalga Cofradía of Santiago de la Espada was founded in the late medieval period and established a limpieza de sangre statute in the early fifteenth century – most likely the oldest in the city.<sup>170</sup> The indirect references to it, and the very few pages left from the statute, show that it was close to what the Santiago order practised, and ‘ordered that everyone with an hábito in this order had to be hijodalgo (noble) by blood from the father’s and mother’s sides, instead of by concession’.<sup>171</sup>

The statutes of this cofradía, which celebrated its cabildos and meetings at the Murcia civic council, were implemented after 1751, when the city obtained the estatuto de nobleza privilege. Most of its members were regidores, and it was in need of reorganisation as the following statement from the cabildo of 18 June 1798 shows:

To honour the request of Jesualdo Riquelme y Fontes to recognise the archives of this cofradía so that the statutes can be rewritten to keep and observe; and that mayordomos take them into consideration and for the applicant cofrades to learn and with knowledge they can take into account these matters in the cabildos, and also the privileges of the Cofradía. As such, Jesualdo Riquelme y Fontes agrees with José Fernández de la Reguera, to recognise such documents and proceed to conform and better instruct the members of this cofradía.<sup>172</sup>

Limpieza de sangre examinations, adapted to Murcia’s estatuto de nobleza, were a common practice with new candidates at the Cofradía. The marquis of Pinares Bernardo Riquelme Salafranca y Rocha’s interrogation on 7 June 1784 shows such a process when he applied to be a member:

Having reviewed the documents of Bernardo Riquelme Salafranca y Rocha, marquis of Pinares, knight maestrante of the Real de Granada, these say that his family is from this city [Murcia], of illustrious and distinguished heritage, which makes him worthy of this illustrious cofradía, named by one of its mayordomos, his great-grandfather Bernardo Salafranca, and has practised with other candidates, and seeking to be part of the service and cult of Señor Santiago de la Espada, begs this illustrious cofradía to accept him among its cofrades, which favour he dearly appreciates; and before starting this process, the following left this room: Antonio Fontes Paz, father-in-law of the marquis, Francisco de Borja Fontes y Riquelme and Nicolas de Avellaneda y Fontes, as his cousins; and to start the panel they assure that the candidate is of noble blood, and has family ties with the main houses of this city, and that if his father Pedro Salafranca and his grandfather Lino were not cofrades and mayordomos of this cofradía it was because they were serving the marquisate in its royal armies in different locations . . . agreement to vote with abas negras y blancas as it is done; and the result agreed to name and admit as cofrade, and to proceed with the regular oath to one of the mayordomos and pay the common dues.<sup>173</sup>

To be a member of the cofradía, or for those who sought to become mayordomos, the examination of the memorial de hidalguía was rigorous. Presenting the proposal to the cabildo was the next step, in case there was a member that opposed the request. And if there were family members in the cabildo they had to leave the room so that the rest could proceed to vote with white and black beans. The designation of regidores and their oath in the position followed the same steps.

The nobility thus remained enclosed, and the relationships forged within the regidurías continued to be strong. Fidelity and kinship ties prevailed. A unique, unified group of regidores and members of the Cofradía Hidalga de Santiago de la Espada then emerged within the local urban oligarchy.

The inquisitorial Cofradía of San Pedro Mártir de Verona shows a similar pattern. Its foundation location was Murcia, in 1603, and its first constitutional rules were from 1607.<sup>175</sup> Although its statutes do not allude specifically to the limpieza de sangre, chapter two declares that ‘it is declared the way to make officials and ministers of the Santo Oficio; in consideration of the Alguacil Mayor, secretaries, and the rest of ministers of the Santo Oficio . . . they need to be admitted by cofrades.’<sup>176</sup> Chapter three then mentions that ‘anyone that is a minister or familiar of the Santo Oficio is admitted.’<sup>177</sup> No examination was needed to accept those individuals – they were already honourable, being or having been part of the Inquisition. All its members should belong to the Santo Tribunal. Although there is no clear reference in the sources to the exact number of Riquelme-Fontes members ascribed, it is safe to assume that the ones who were familiares of the Santo Oficio or had a position in the Inquisition also belonged to the Cofradía of San Pedro Mártir de Verona.

Besides the pious and welfare functions of the cofradías, their most important mission was to eradicate heresy: ‘anyone that becomes cofrade’, chapter four states, must take an oath ‘to serve the Santo Oficio diligently . . . and to denounce before the tribunal any heretical offence’.<sup>178</sup>

And, in addition, inquisidores, officials, ministers and familiares of the Santo Oficio received bulas apostólicas, privileges and indulgences from Popes Urban IV, Clement IV, Gregory IX, Clement VII and Pius V, ‘to the Crucesignatos or familiares of the Santo Oficio [. . .] that every time they burn a heretic they receive a Privilegio de Indulgencia Plenaria, a privilege for those who favour the Holy Land’.<sup>180</sup> Members of the urban oligarchy thus craved being part of a cofradía – it conferred qualities such as being cristiano viejo, of having noble ancestry, and of having a deep defence of Christianity. In the public sphere, it translated into a symbol of honour and fervent Catholicism.

The Riquelme-Fontes also belonged to other brotherhoods such as the noble cofradías of San Salvador, Chinchilla and San Ildefonso, on the side of Macías Fontes Carrillo (first marquis of Torre Pacheco), and the cofradías of Nuestra Señora de la Soledad, the one in the kingdom of Valencia, on Caro Fontes’s side, or the Cofradía of Santo Cristo through Lino Salafranca.

In the Spanish monarchy both religious and civil powers were closely linked through enclosed spaces of sociability such as the noble brotherhoods. The Cofradía of Santiago was tied to the regidores and that of San Pedro with the familiares of the Santo Oficio. Both power blocs were controlled by a reduced group of the oligarchy, with some prominent families that bonded over strong kinship ties.

One institution where the Riquelme and Fontes lineages had little to no presence was the Colegios Mayores, where strict limpieza de sangre examinations were also common.<sup>183</sup> There is no evidence of a broad participation in Colegios – only Antonio Fontes Ortega participated in Salamanca when he studied on a scholarship. He later was colegial mayor, and also dean, in the Colegio Mayor of Cuenca.<sup>184</sup> He had a long career as a lawyer before the Tribunal and later he presented his doctoral dissertation on 24 March 1747.<sup>185</sup>

By building a noble genealogy and showing their connection to the most illustrious institutions of the Spanish ancien régime, the Riquelme lineage's goal was to erase from collective memory any sign that could link their lineage to a family of Jewish ancestry (see figure 2.1, and appendix pp. 298, 299). A judeizante origin could damage the honour and nobilísima hidalguía of the lineage. People should not forget the illustrious past of the Riquelme, and with that objective the best strategy was to connect all members of each generation with the most prominent and honourable social groups of the ancien régime.

3.1. Marriage Strategies to Remain in Power: Family Bonds and Kinship, 1500s–1800s

Marriage is a key moment in the life-cycle: it is the start of a new family.<sup>1</sup> When analysing the oligarchy and those with power in society, marriage is an essential tool to trace strategies and social alliances between elite ruling families. In Mediterranean Europe these groups use marriage to maintain and, if possible, also increase, their social status. Through marriage among families within the same – or higher – social status, the elite also reproduces socially as a family group, thus preventing a depletion of long-standing bloodlines.<sup>2</sup>

Alliances and marriages resulted in a large social network that united individuals from different oligarchic families. In Europe and southern Spain, ties among the individuals were based on solidarity, dependency, clientelism and domination.<sup>3</sup> However, these relationships were far from being ties among equals. In the society of the ancien régime in the Spanish monarchy, there was a clear hierarchy even within the same estate, and to protect one's position on the ladder it was important to be linked to families who were higher on it. Domination was not exerted by force; it was achieved through ordinary, commonplace mechanisms inherent in patronage and clientelism – awarding gracias y mercedes, assuring protection, doing favours, sponsoring a variety of activities, and looking for integration and understanding. And clearly, violence and coercion to achieve these ends were used when needed.<sup>4</sup> The relation between Fajardo and Riquelme members, and their protections regarding the adelantados in southern Castile in the kingdom of Murcia at the end of the fifteenth century was evidence of how these mechanisms had worked to elevate the lineages in the Murcian urban oligarchy.

Behind the alliance with the Comontes family there were additional religious interests. From the time the relationship began, and all through the early modern period, the Riquelme held important positions in the cabildo eclesiástico such as dignidades, canonjías or raciones. In addition, the union with other important noble families in Murcia, especially the Fontes family, was another example of homogamy (marrying equals) to maintain and consolidate their elite social status.<sup>5</sup>

From the top of the social pyramid, a wide and lengthy social network develops and brings together prominent families of the kingdom of Murcia and comes to encompass the social, political and religious power spheres. That was the ultimate goal of the elite, to be part of each of these spaces of power, and marriage among the powerful was indeed the best way to achieve it. This was a very common practice in communities of Mediterranean Europe.<sup>6</sup> The social enclosing of the nobility was thus sociopolitical and economic in nature. Permanently holding the main positions of power, either in the civil sphere and the cabildo eclesiástico, and also keeping property and patrimony within the family and through inheritance, were the main elements for the group's social reproduction and plans to stay at the top.<sup>7</sup>

This chapter explains how the Riquelme lineage, beginning in the sixteenth century and through the eighteenth century, perpetuated its presence and dominance through a system of marriage alliances in southern Castile. Generation after generation, in the ancien régime, the objective of keeping social groups enclosed remained the oligarchy's most fundamental objective in the Crown of Castile.<sup>8</sup>

3.1.1. The Riquelme, Fajardo and Comontes: The Conquest, and Sociopolitical and Religious Power

Chapters one and two explained how marriage strategies with Fajardo family members and developing clientele relationships with this group increased the Riquelme lineage role in the kingdom of Murcia's political life. Marriage was the main instrument that oligarch families in the Iberian kingdoms used to maintain and increase a high socioeconomic status, and, in this sense, this section also analyses the key role that women played in socially reproducing a family name and its social goals.

The Riquelme chose to join the Fajardo lineage through one of its collateral lines, through the marital union of Francisco Riquelme and Isabel Gómez Dávalos in the early fifteenth century. Isabel was the daughter of Murcia's adelantado, Pedro Gómez Dávalos, the nephew of adelantado Alonso Yáñez Fajardo and also related to the condestable of Castile, Rui López Dávalos, whom Francisco Riquelme had also formerly served. The kinship of Alonso Yáñez and Pedro Gómez was almost purely of a political nature.<sup>9</sup>

After this marriage, the Riquelme were fully immersed in the Fajardo sphere of influence, and this took Riquelme family members to the highest positions of sociopolitical power of the kingdom of Murcia and the Crown of Castile. Most importantly, the social role of patrón—cliente becomes clear and explicit with this union: there was an implied mutual reciprocity between both names in terms of political, social and family links, though it was also unbalanced between a superior Fajardo and a lower-status Riquelme lineage.<sup>10</sup>

In the mid-fifteenth century, Francisco Riquelme's and Isabel Gómez's first-born son, Alonso Riquelme, married Catalina de Quirós, cousin of the comendador of Santiago, Juan Ruíz de Quirós. The couple had three children, Martín, Diego and Luis Riquelme. The marriage allowed the Riquelme to be in contact with illustrious individuals with positions in the Order of Santiago. After Isabel's death, Alonso Riquelme's second marriage was to María Sánchez de Torres, daughter of Juan Sánchez de Torres, one of the sixteen regidores of king John II.<sup>11</sup> Slowly, the Riquelme wove a thick network of relationships within the different socioeconomic, religious and political powers, and they fully participated in it and benefited from it. This was a wide practice in Europe during the early modern period and in the transition to the nineteenth century.<sup>12</sup> Marriage was the motor of the lineage's pursuit of relationships with the most prominent families in all areas of power.<sup>13</sup> The generation after put into practice a series of strategies that became regular during the early modern period. These are key to analysing and understanding the politics of marriage and the lineage strategy between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries.

Among the Murcian elite, families allied to narrow their political, social, economic and religious ties. The matrimonial unions of Diego Riquelme (first lord of Coy) and Martín Riquelme 'el valeroso', children of Alonso Riquelme and Catalina Quirós, are a revealing example. They show the typical demographic structure of the alliances between noble families in Mediterranean Europe, which Gérard Delille has thoroughly documented for the Neapolitan case in southern Italy.<sup>14</sup> There were double marriages or 'matrimonios a trueque', usually joining brother and sister with sister and brother, which also allowed for other combinations and different dates at which the marriages could be arranged.<sup>15</sup> It is worth highlighting the existence of crossed marriages that join siblings of different sex, and the simple or parallel ones, that united two brothers with two sisters (see figures 3.1 and 3.2).

Figure 3.2 shows an example of crossed marriages of siblings of the same sex – Diego Riquelme married Aldonza de Comontes

Vilagomez, and Martín Riquelme married María de Comontes Villagomez in a second marriage at the end of the sixteenth century. Aldonza and María were the daughters of Juan de Comontes de Villagomez and María Ceron, and also nieces of Diego de Comontes, bishop of Cartagena, which allowed the Riquelme to be part of the ecclesiastical elite.<sup>18</sup> The Comontes name, which later in the mid-sixteenth century also linked the Riquelme to the Coque family through the union of Alonso Riquelme de Comontes (second lord of Coy) and Inés Coque, was key to opening positions in the cabildo catedralicio. The brothers of Inés, Macías and Luis Coque, already held the positions of canónigos and racioneros in the cathedral. In addition, they owned large properties that made up the señorío of La Nora, all linked through the mayorazgo of 1559.<sup>19</sup>

In southern Europe, as for the case of the kingdom of Murcia, exogamous marriages to unite individuals of the same socioeconomic status, mainly to diversify and complement economic resources and to increase family landownership, also allowed social homogamy to thrive.<sup>20</sup> When Comontes and Coque joined names – an important line of the Riquelme lineage – the Coque family opened the doors into the religious sphere. It meant access to positions and also new ways to enlarge their landownership through the fusion of the three names in the Riquelme lineage, resulting in the creation of large mayorazgos.

In this oligarchic group, and in the Riquelme name in particular, it was common to marry twice. They did this for two reasons: one, to rise in socioeconomic status if one of the partners in the marriage was above the other in social status terms; and second, responding to demographic factors, since the reason for the first marriage often made parties too far apart in age and increased the probability of one widowing early, leaving the family with no successor to continue the lineage.<sup>21</sup>

Three marriages were also registered at times – Martín Riquelme ‘el valeroso’ did it at the start of the sixteenth century. Though the reasons for the spousal deaths are unknown, the sources show that Martín was deeply aware of the role that his marriages played in securing the continuation of the lineage. He had participated in the reconquest of Granada and was close to the court of the Catholic monarchs, and these were also favourable factors for important families to establish family links with the Riquelme name.

Through a studied marriage strategy, the Riquelme family built a social network with all the feudal spheres of power of the late medieval period in the Crown of Castile. In doing so, the Riquelme lineage was entrenched in the Murcian oligarchy, which was the starting point of future alliances and family and sociopolitical linkages with the most important names of the kingdom of Murcia's elite. Through Martín's actions, the lineage reached the most elevated strata of power inside various institutions: the court, the military orders, the concejo, the bishopric and the Inquisition.

Everything worked in favour of Martín Riquelme. Through three marriages he extended his social network, which helped him consolidate the family group's sociopolitical aspirations, and he also got heirs to assure the continuity of the lineage and the protection of economic patrimony. First, he married Aldonza de Cascales, daughter of Juan Martínez de Cascales, a member of the council for the Catholic monarchs, and Beatriz Alonso (señora del hábito de Lavanda), direct cousin of Francisco de Cascales, maestresala for the king.<sup>22</sup> This union facilitated the presence and continuity of the family at court.

Second, he married María de Comontes Villagomez, niece of Diego de Comontes, bishop of Cartagena. As mentioned above, his brother Diego Riquelme (first lord of Coy), married María's sister, Aldonza de Comontes Villagomez – a crossed marriage between brothers and sisters – which explains how this union introduced the Riquelme into the heart of the ecclesiastical elite.

Without heirs from the first two marriages, Martín had to marry a third time. The new spouse was Constanza de Barrientos, lady to Isabella the Catholic, daughter of Fernando Barrientos (knight of the hábito of Santiago, member of the council for the Catholic monarchs and corregidor of Murcia) and of Isabel Vozmediano y

Table 3.1 The zenith of the Riquelme lineage: Martín Riquelme's ('el valeroso') marriage strategy

Mendoza. She also was the sister of Lope Barrientos, general inquisidor of Castile, bishop of Ávila, Segovia and Cuenca, and the niece of the duke of maqueda, marquis of Elche and other great names (grandes) of Castile's elite.<sup>23</sup> Through this union the Riquelme tackled the court, the Order of Santiago and the concejo of Murcia, which itself was closely linked with the highest position of the kingdom, the corregidor. The third marriage opened the door to establishing links with the newly created and powerful Inquisition.

A rigorous strategy of alliances with the prominent names from both civil and ecclesiastical spheres of power placed the Riquelme lineage, by the beginning of the sixteenth century, within each and every one of the powers of feudal origin and civil and religious institutions: the monarchy, the concejo, the Inquisition, the military orders and the bishopric.<sup>24</sup> Martín Riquelme's three marriages were clear evidence of this process. There were other key individuals in each generation of the Riquelme lineage as well, and an analysis of their social trajectories and life-cycles is fundamental to understanding and evaluating the larger picture of strategies and behavioural mechanisms of the lineage.<sup>25</sup>

Behind the interests and specific behaviours there were a series of strategies and modi operandi that need to be understood more broadly in relation to the group.<sup>26</sup> Each action that an individual takes comes back as a benefit to the entire group. There is a back-and-forth feedback or reciprocity between the individual and the group. Each event influences the social actor and his family context in a particular way, and both sides are always in relation to one another; they both exist as a result of mutual favour and benefit from each other.<sup>27</sup> These practices were very common in Europe and had special emphasis in communities of Mediterranean Europe. It is important to go from the particular to the general or, in other words, the evolution of a family group must be analysed at a small scale but also extending the space and time of inquiry so that it is possible to perceive the continuities and changes of the patterns that the most important lineages experienced between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries. In the words of Michel Bertrand, 'l'approche micro-historique permet ainsi de souligner la richesse d'identités collectives et individuelles'.<sup>28</sup> Hence the case of Martín Riquelme is particularly relevant during this period – his alliances are the starting point for the Riquelme becoming one of the most important lineages in the kingdom of Murcia.

By the start of the sixteenth century, the marriage alliances were already promoting members of the Riquelme family into important civil and ecclesiastical positions. They were building a tight family network, tying both the political (with positions in the concejo of Murcia) and the religious (some members were arcedianos, canónigos or racioneros) spheres, making group and family interests dominate over that of the individual.<sup>29</sup>

Chapter four explains, in detail, how the Riquelme family built an extensive patrimony by founding mayorazgos, and how, as a result, it became one of the most important landowning families in the kingdom of Murcia. So, added to the sociopolitical and religious interests, this economic element was another crucial factor. Only economic purpose can explain the crossed marriage of Salvadora Riquelme (daughter of Diego Riquelme, first lord of Coy, and Aldonza Villagomez de Comontes) and Lorenzo Riquelme de Barrientos (son of Martín Riquelme ‘el valeroso’ and Constanza de Barrientos), both first cousins, married during the first third of the sixteenth century to Juan Fajardo and Isabel Fajardo respectively, both children of María Navarra and Lorenzo Fajardo, grandson of the adelantado mayor Alonso Yañez Fajardo I.<sup>32</sup>

Beginning with these two unions, another pattern emerges in the Riquelme matrimonial strategies: marrying members from different generations. Both Isabel and Juan Fajardo are from one generation earlier than that of Salvadora and Lorenzo Riquelme. There is a jump of generations to tighten up the links between both lineages, and this is how the Riquelme got inserted within the Fajardo clientele from this time on. This transversal, intergenerational cut – when one spouse is much older than the other – was a widely used practice among the families of the oligarchy, and the Riquelme lineage is a perfect example of this.<sup>33</sup>

Figure 3.3 details an intergenerational union. Based on the sources for the case of Spain, and for the Riquelme in particular, these unions happened between aunt/uncle and niece/nephew. Ultimately, there was a social enclosing of the families that belong to the oligarchy to strengthen their power against the middle layers of the social hierarchy.

The most powerful group in the kingdom of Murcia, the Fajardo, enlarged its clientele and its sociopolitical interests by establishing these ties. The relationships were evidently unequal, and such imbalance remained, became entrenched and difficult to break up over time. In addition, the Fajardo had important economic interests that went along with these unions – both sides benefited from the increasing accumulation and combination of each of the families' properties. For example, Juan Fajardo and Salvadora Riquelme's first-born, Alonso Fajardo, was also lord of the Palomar.

Thus, it was at the start of the sixteenth century, at the end of the reconquest, that the Riquelme family began to establish its socio-economic power and to make important family ties, especially with the oligarchic, powerful and already entrenched Murcian Fajardo lineage. This connection was the starting point for the family's patrimony to continue to grow through marriages and relationships, at this time mostly of exogamic character, with families from the elite in Murcia such as Avilés, Pagán, Fontes de Albornoz, Fontes Carrillo, Melgarejo, Peraleja, Bernal, Verástegui and Bienvenida.<sup>34</sup> Through them, the Riquelme reached important spheres of power. This was the genesis of the Murcian oligarchy, which grew to become a closed group concentrating more and more power for future generations.

3.1.2. Riquelme and Fontes: Consolidation in the Oligarchy

The concepts of family, lineage, and marriage alliances were deeply entrenched in the social mechanisms and strategies that the Riquelme lineage pursued, beginning in the late fifteenth century, and especially at the end of the eighteenth century. In southern Europe the family was at the centre of a society where social relations were based on consanguinity between directly related individuals, but also based on filiation in a fictitious sense – non-consanguinity-related individuals who instead had strong links based on loyalty, patronage and solidarity.<sup>35</sup>

The inheritance system in place, structured through primogeniture, also fundamentally shaped the relations between families in the oligarchy. The family patrimony accumulated following an agnaticia (agnatic) line, prioritising male figures in the family, so that property did not disperse through collateral branches of the lineage.<sup>36</sup> The institution of the mayorazgo in the Iberian kingdoms served as the main tool to achieve this goal as well.

The lineage served to reference having a common ancestor from whom the entire family descended.<sup>37</sup> This figure had settled in the kingdom in the time of the reconquest after achieving glorious acts and deeds, which in turn provided the name/lineage with honour and prestige. The descendants were from then on able to claim and be proud of being cristianos viejos.

The lineage marked how to move strategies and alliances with families in the oligarchy following a twofold purpose: first, so that the main line of the lineage remained, and second, to avoid the dispersal of the family patrimony, which stayed in the hands of the first-born son through the mayorazgo. The Riquelme-Fontes alliance was the perfect example of this model. After gaining prestige at the end of the reconquest and through the sixteenth century, the way for the Riquelme to solidify their position was by combining forces with another lineage at a similar level. Through the generations, both lineages established continuous alliances. As figure 3.4 shows, at times, the families had to wait two or three generations to be able to unite again. The 1215 Lateran Council (Concilio de Letrán) prohibited marriages within four grades of consanguinity in Catholic Europe.<sup>38</sup> However, both lineages elided this limitation by applying for a dispensa apostólica (apostolic exemption). Once they reached the fourth degree, the Riquelme and the Fontes family united again to avoid dispersing their patrimony, practising what is called a marriage turn or bucle matrimonial.<sup>39</sup>

The Riquelme-Fontes unions allow us to trace the social network of both families in a context of regrouping, reproduction and social enclosing of the oldest nobility lineages of the Murcian oligarchy. Not without friction about inheritance, the connection introduced the Riquelme family into the group of prestigious names that helped the lineage attain a significant economic family patrimony.

The supposedly Castilian equal inheritance system, which ended up favouring the first-born by using the mayorazgo, is what made families pursue endogamy more frequently. The mayorazgo avoided the dispersal of the patrimony from a system based on the division of inheritance. In addition, it allowed families to create a new patrimony.<sup>40</sup> Marriages between uncles and nieces (or aunts and nephews), and between two brothers and two sisters, were especially useful and meaningful in creating these kinds of kinship relationships and communities in Mediterranean Europe, mainly in southern France, Italy and Spain. And the Riquelme-Fontes example is a relevant case of such a practice. A range of family names unite through a chain of alliances that becomes the ideal strategy to maintain a system of equal division of inheritance only among territorially localised relationships.<sup>41</sup>

The first alliance of the Riquelme-Fontes occurred during the first third of the sixteenth century with the marriage of Macías Coque Riquelme and Constanza de Avilés y Fontes. Macías Coque was the head of the Riquelme lineage who led the group against other factions in the frequent conflicts of the time.<sup>42</sup>

From then on, during the second half of the sixteenth century, short cycles of one or two generations of unions between Riquelme-Fontes or Fontes-Riquelme occurred, when surnames weave and create a subtle game of marriage alliances (see the complete genealogy of the two lineages in chapter two). The ultimate goal is to avoid requesting a dispensa (exemption) – families in Catholic Europe waited to the fourth and fifth grades of consanguinity, not vetoed by the Vatican, to unite again – to keep the patrimony together and not lose the family name of the lineage. Social homogamy and endogamy thus became a pattern of Spanish elite society.

Such social mechanisms are an attempt to find the middle ground between kinship and social considerations. The dispensas that the Church provided were a clear expression of the importance of endogamy in marriage practices that saw family relationships as key to consolidate or defend acquisitions.<sup>43</sup> The common denominator of all these alliances was the number of marriages within a family as a close group which avoided loss of patrimony. In the case of the Riquelme-Fontes, as they put into practice such marriage strategies, there were limited consanguineal marriages – three in the sixteenth century, and a fourth in the eighteenth century.

By practising bucle matrimonial, by waiting several generations to unite, in fourth grade of consanguinity but only between related family members, and avoiding the canonical prohibition, the

Intending spouses	Consanguineal level	Marriage date

Riquelme-Fontes unions reveal a strategy. The ultimate goal is to maintain the biological line, the main branch of the lineage, thus avoiding the loss of the surname and the family patrimony. Evidence of this was the marriage between Cristóbal Riquelme de Arroniz (third lord of Santo Ángel) and Nofra Riquelme, who were related by blood, in the early sixteenth century.<sup>45</sup> The spouses created a mayorazgo in 1544 to join together, in one unit, their multiple properties.<sup>46</sup>

The next marriage between blood-related spouses, that of Cristóbal Riquelme de Comontes (fourth lord of Coy) and Antonia de Arroniz Riquelme (uncle and niece), happened in the second half of the sixteenth century.<sup>47</sup> This union was important because it joined two main sections of the Riquelme lineage, both descendants of Guillén Riquelme's lines in Campo Coy and Santo Ángel. Both patrimonies came together through their first-born son, Cristóbal Riquelme y Arroniz, who became lord of Coy and fourth lord of Santo Ángel. In addition, this marriage was also the genesis of the core stem of the Riquelme lineage.

Of equal relevance was the late sixteenth-century union between Petronila Riquelme de Avilés, the daughter of Macías Coque Riquelme and Constanza de Avilés y Fontes, with Baltasar Fontes Riquelme, son of Nofre Fontes de Albornoz y Avilés and Isabel Pagán Riquelme.<sup>48</sup> On the one hand, two blood-related individuals married – Baltasar was Petronila's nephew – and on the other hand, after Isabel Pagán Riquelme and Nofre Fontes de Albornoz y Avilés's marriage on 13 March 1593, the patrimonies were linked though the creation of a mayorazgo that was later transferred to the first-born son, Baltasar Fontes.<sup>49</sup> Worth remembering here is that the female heir of Macías Coque Riquelme's link was his daughter Petronila. The achievement at this point was the strengthening of the family's name through the cognaticia line, since the marriage between Macías Coque Riquelme and Constanza de Avilés y Fontes had no legitimate male descendants (see the complete Riquelme genealogy tree, thirteenth to eighteenth century, figure 4.26).

So, in less than two generations, two marriages between Riquelme-Fontes members were celebrated. Thus the bucle matrimonial is again put into practice to integrate patrimony and properties linked to Macías Fontes Riquelme – first-born of Baltasar and Petronila, baptised on 26 October 1601 – both from his paternal and maternal grandparents.<sup>50</sup> This case also exemplifies the key role that women played in the social perpetuation and reproduction of the lineage in Mediterranean Europe and southern Castile.

It was not until the second half of the eighteenth century, however, when the next marriage between blood-related individuals, and a bucle matrimonial, was again registered.<sup>51</sup> Jesualdo Riquelme y Fontes (lord of Guadalupe) and María de la Concepción Fontes Riquelme, uncle and niece, married to avoid the dispersal of their patrimony. Such a social mechanism helps the kinship line to maintain the patrimony in one line of succession – Jesualdo Riquelme was the immediate successor of his father's mayorazgo as the only male child of Joaquín Riquelme y Togores.<sup>52</sup> In this case as well, a transversal cut occurred, as they skipped one generation.

After the union of Petronila Riquelme and Baltasar Fontes, it was not until the great-grandson Pedro Fontes married Juana Riquelme Cervellón (baptised on 22 March 1591 in the parish of San Lorenzo) that the bucle could be repeated once more.<sup>53</sup> A long cycle of time intervened in order to avoid the need for a canonical exception.<sup>54</sup> Similarly, the 1749 marriage of Antonio Fontes Ortega Carrillo y Zambrana with Luisa Robles Serrano y Molina resulted in a region-wide connection of inheritances, titles and links. Luisa and Antonio's marriage linked regions in southern Spain, Andalucía, central Spain, La Mancha and Murcia.<sup>55</sup> Luisa had ties with Hoya-Morena, Tobarra, Las Montañas, Nazaret and San Clemente de la Mancha in the south

(in places like Baza, Iznalloz, Alcalá la Real, Llóbreaga, Puebla de Don Fadrique, Hurdienca, San Miguel and Corvera) as daughter of the first marriage of Joaquín Riquelme y Togores, which also meant that she was part of the main line of the Riquelme lineage through the Robles-Serrano name. Antonio was similarly well connected as regidor of Murcia, founding father of the Real Sociedad Económica de Amigos del País in that city, as heir to the mayorazgo (founded 15 September 1542) of the comendador Pedro Zambrana and his spouse Ginesa Corella, as well as the vínculo (founded 2 July 1731) that his father Antonio Fontes Carrillo Bienvenud y Arce created in 1731 after the death of his older brother Rodrigo Fontes Ortega from mental health troubles.<sup>56</sup>

In the Iberian kingdoms throughout the eighteenth century, especially during the second half, the social enclosing and narrowing of the Riquelme-Fontes lineage was most evident when the combining of patrimony through mayorazgos occurred to avoid dispersal among collateral sides of the lineage.

Within this context consanguine marriages took place in Mediterranean Europe, skipping one generation or two, but also allocating, in a strategic way, the main mayorazgos in the hands of key members of the lineage and marrying twice or even three times to achieve both social and economic goals.<sup>57</sup> Such was the case of Luisa's father, Joaquín Riquelme y Togores (who died at the end of the eighteenth century), who married three times: first, Manuela de Robles y Molina; second, Luisa's mother, Ana María Buendía y Fontes, with whom he had another legitimate daughter, Francisca Riquelme y Buendía; and third, Antonia Fontes Paz. Jesualdo Riquelme y Fontes was the legitimate son of this last marriage with Antonia.<sup>58</sup> The Riquelme-Fontes alliance comes out strongly after these marriages as a social group and also because of the centralisation of patrimony under one name.

The union that took place in the parish of San Nicolás (Murcia) in 1753 between Antonio Fontes Paz (third marquis of Torre Pacheco, baptised 7 November 1730 in the parish of San Bartolomé) and Francisca Riquelme y Buendía (baptised seven years later in the same location) is central to understanding the importance of the Riquelme-Fontes alliance of the eighteenth century.<sup>59</sup> It gave the Riquelme lineage the way to connect with the house of Fontes-Pacheco (its name comes from the marquise of Torre Pacheco), which in turn connected the Riquelme family with the Fontes lineage and, most importantly, with the Paz name, which was well connected in the court in Madrid. As chapter four shows, this is what gave Antonio Fontes Paz an impressively large patrimony based on vinculaciones and mayorazgos. In 1788 he married Isabel Rodríguez de Navarra Mergelina from Villena, the daughter of Alonso Rodríguez de Navarra y Mergelina and Juliana Mergelina.<sup>60</sup> The link with the Rodríguez Mergelina family helped to broaden the socioeconomic importance of the lineage beyond Murcia's outskirts, specifically in the old marquisate of Villena.

Both of Jesualdo Riquelme's weddings are part of all this step-by-step process. In 1776, his marriage to Isabel María Abad y Ulloa, originally from Villahermosa (Ciudad Real), was ratified in the parish of San Nicolás in the city of Murcia.<sup>61</sup> Isabel María was Felipa Abad y Ulloa's sister, the spouse of Francisco de Borja Fontes y Riquelme, nephew of Jesualdo Riquelme, thus maintaining the same strategy explained before of joining illustrious families located outside the kingdom of Murcia. In this case it was the family name Abad. Felipa and Isabel were the daughters of Sancho José Abad y Sandoval (born in Villahermosa, alcalde ordinario of the villa of Beas and knight of Calatrava since 1700), and Ana María de Ulloa y Olmedilla.<sup>62</sup>

María Ignacia Riquelme y Abad was Jesualdo and Isabel María's only daughter, and when Isabel María died at the end of the eighteenth century, Jesualdo married his direct niece, María Concepción Fontes y Riquelme, and had a son, Antonio Riquelme y Fontes.<sup>63</sup> The link with the Abad family is an example of the reaches of the family as it expands horizontally by enlarging the family group through non-consanguine unions (marriages that take place among people who do not share blood ties, bonds of an exogamous nature). But endogamy, or consanguine marriage, was also common, which served to reaffirm the vertical line around the jefe-patrón (ego) and thus the power and hegemony of the lineage and the centralisation of property through one heir only. Jesualdo Riquelme y Fontes became the jefe-patrón and representative of the main line of the lineage as first-born son of Joaquín Riquelme y Togores and heir of the mayorazgos.

The overall result of these strategies was the absolute closeness of the vertical kinship, which helped to avoid the dispersal of the family patrimony by keeping the name of the lineage attached to landownership. A possible outcome could also have been the biological stagnation and disappearance of the lineage by the start of the nineteenth century as a result of the tightness enforced through the marriage alliances between the Fontes and Riquelme families. possibility offers to throw light on understanding why the oligarchy changed strategies as the ancien régime was coming to an end.

3.1.3. Marriage and Patrimony. An Approach to the Family Group Economy: The Dowry

The dowry and the arras (bride price) were what the spouses contributed when they married, as a way to augment the economic and social capital of the family group. Though the sources in this regard are dispersed and fragmented, there is enough evidence to demonstrate that the value of the dowry and the arras (or the goods that the groom brought to the wedding) when marrying were of great importance – these confirmed that in Catholic Europe the family's structure and the system of inheritance were intimately related in only one marriage-patrimony concept.<sup>67</sup>

More than a union between two people, in pre-industrial societies, marriage was a union between two families. Social mobility can be understood through the analysis and quantification of the dowry and the arras as well. The dowry was made of both tangible property and landownership, and it was provided to the daughter through paternal and maternal inheritance to become her economic contribution to marriage.<sup>68</sup>

Among oligarchic families, it was common to avoid giving lands to daughters since this hindered social and economic reproduction. Often wealthy families chose convent life for their daughters to concentrate the patrimony in the first-born son through mayorazgo. Another option was to enhance the dowry of a daughter sufficiently to marry her to someone of equal or higher socioeconomic status. There were several women from the Riquelme-Fontes lineage who began to wear the hábito in the convents of San Antonio, the Carmelitas Descalzas convent, and the convent in Santa Clara la Real among others.<sup>69</sup> There is only evidence for one nun having a dowry: it was Sister Teresa Fontes Pérez de Merlos (the daughter of Macías Fontes Carrillo, first marquis of Torre Pacheco, and of Josefa Mariana Pérez Evia de Merlos) for over 1,000 ducados. The dowry was an important indicator of status and a symbol of social prestige.<sup>70</sup>

The arras was the property and economic contribution that the husband brought into a marriage. Its origins are in ancient Europe's Germanic societies.<sup>71</sup> The dowry was usually of higher value (see table 3.7), evidence of the crucial role that women played in the marriages of spouses of high social prestige. The arras were commonly cash, though the husband sometimes also brought other goods such as alhajas (jewellery), clothing, and also land property or houses. Arras were, with some exceptions like the case of Martín Riquelme 'el valeroso', who contributed money, mostly fertile lands and houses.

3.2. Development of Social Network and Life-cycle: A Micro-historic Analysis

Historians have not clearly used the concept of social network analysis and it is a controversial one among scholars.<sup>74</sup> Since it is a concept from sociology, and has its roots in network analysis theories of the early twentieth century, historians, and especially early modern scholars, are wary of its validity.<sup>75</sup> The scarcity and fragmented nature of the sources for understanding the social network of specific individuals has also generated debate among historians.

Most of the studies about the concept are in-depth epistemological discussions about the idea and not so much about the actual network created and the social actors involved in it. In other words, it is important to give first names and surnames to these actors and identify why they were related to each other, and based on their social status, what were the links, the strategies and the social mechanisms that united them and their environment? Only a few studies that analyse the Castilian nobility's commerce networks and spheres of political influence in the nineteenth century have made use of this concept to analyse social relations.<sup>76</sup>

To see how ancien régime elites in early modern Europe created a social network, the following analysis focuses on the relations between the powerful and those who depended on them – it is key to understanding how space and sociopolitical and economic power were divided and vertically structured. This section explores the complex context by analysing patronage and clientele relations. In such a hierarchised and unbalanced society, consanguine (family-based) and non-consanguine (related family or allegados) relations defined the entire social fabric. In this case, it was the Murcian elite in the Crown of Castile. The group and clientele features have to be at the centre of our understanding of social and political actors in the ancien régime and beyond.

The individual as a social actor and his/her social trajectory are central to reconstructing social networks. As far as possible, it is important to track each of the actions of an individual's life-cycle – each of the main moments that an individual goes through in life, such as baptism, marriage and death. In ancien régime societies of both Protestant and Catholic Europe, all of these life milestones were related to and based upon the group's interest.<sup>77</sup> As opposed to macro studies, microhistory is the ideal framework to make one-to-one relationships the main focus to study groups and broader concepts. A local perspective is key while studying global socioeconomic processes. Microhistory demonstrates that both local and global scales complement each other, giving historians perspectives and making their analysis permanently aware of socioeconomic, political and cultural changes at either level.<sup>78</sup>

Studying the milieu or social environment where individuals evolve in the case of the Murcian oligarchy in a typical Mediterranean community, and particularly the Riquelme family, allows for a close look at the group's relational capital. Exploring how individuals at the same socioeconomic, and also from different social levels, relate to each other brings out the strategies used to define a group within the elite and how the group maintained or increased its social status.

To tackle this, it is crucial to reconstruct the individual socially through kinship and by examining the alliances that developed through marriage strategies. Ideas around sociability, patronage and clientelism emerge in these strategies. In other words, baptismal and marriage documentation, where a priest, the godparents and the witnesses are present and are not chosen randomly, is what can take the researcher through the kinship links that elite families forged. Marriage is a fundamental mechanism that oligarchic families such as the Riquelme used to connect with other prestigious names and create a social group that sought to close up in itself. Social capital – status and prestige are intangible contributions from families – is generated in marriage and other mechanisms, and over time combines with economic capital – also through families, and specially through the creation of mayorazgos. Parish documents are pivotal in examining the Riquelme's social network, as well as wills that mention witnesses, and other sources like protocol files and purity of blood records.<sup>79</sup>

Exploring the diverse sociability spaces of the Murcian elite is also a crucial method when reconstructing social networks of the Crown of Castile. The juntas or meetings and cabildos (formal religious and political meetings) of noble cofradías such as Santiago de la Espada, and cofradías pasionarias like Nuestro Padre Jesús Nazareno constituted a social structure themselves. Only nobles could be members of the cofradía of Santiago de la Espada. They met at cabildos in Murcia's city hall, a membership full of regidores who were also part of the cabildos of the concejo.<sup>80</sup> During the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, the members of the Nuestro Padre Jesús Nazareno cofradía were individuals from emerging socioeconomic levels such as artisan and traders' guilds. Later in the mid-eighteenth century the majority of the members were from the Murcian oligarchy, almost mirroring the constituents of the cofradía of Santiago de la Espada.<sup>81</sup>

Consanguine, spiritual and other familial types of relations, as well as friendship, patronage, clientelism and those affairs that develop in spaces of sociability such as cofradías, all map the social apparatus of the Riquelme. They also made up a thick screen of relations representing the entire spectrum of the Murcian oligarchy.<sup>82</sup> Still, the sources do not give a complete picture – parish records, for example, provide scattered information and thus to trace an exhaustive and lineal chronology of events is not always possible. The closer to the nineteenth century, however, the more complete the sources are.

Social connections provide hints on how to reconstruct the social network. The starting point is the individual's personal relations, and the entire structure that operates inside the group. It is essential to examine closely what was written about certain individuals using prosopography.<sup>83</sup> The case of Antonio Fontes Paz, third marquis of Torre Pacheco's social trajectory is important, for example, for learning about the social mechanisms and tracing the changes that the Riquelme-Fontes group performed and experienced in the second half of the eighteenth century. Furthermore, these social trajectories are representative of broader social changes ongoing in the transition from the ancien régime to modern societies in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

The social relationships between Riquelme-Fontes and the high clergy are clearly stated in the baptismal and marriage records, and though these are fewer in number than the relationships established with the lower clergy, qualitatively they were more important. In other words, the family names with whom the Riquelme-Fontes created ties were those of oligarchic families with key positions in the cabildo catedralicio, which ultimately strengthened the solidarity, patronage and clientelist relations between the Riquelme group and the ecclesiastical elite (see figures 3.5 and 3.6).

Witnesses and godparents were not chosen randomly to be part of the traditional religious ceremonies. As mentioned before, the Riquelme selectively picked members of their own family or from the urban oligarchy for marriage and baptismal events. Compadrazgo (joint godparenting, ritual kinship)<sup>85</sup> became the main element of connection among individuals involved in these closer and eventually narrow relationships of the local elite.

The family names that were related to the Riquelme through these kinds of relationships were also the ones that were connected to the family through familial kinship, an old marriage, or because they were included in a political faction of their allegados. All these relationships were embedded in particular social and political interests, and especially in economic advantage. From having established connections based either on blood ties or unions based on fictitious kinship with names such as Fontes Carrillo, Rocamora, Pagán, Fontes Alborno, de la Peraleja and Paz, the Riquelme founded mayorazgos that eventually increased their family patrimony.

powers) and deeds of dowry provide a guide as to how to reconstruct the extensive network of social relationships and the level of closeness to Antonio Fontes Paz. In cases of arrendamientos of land, family members and other individuals such as labourers and peasants living on the lands of the Riquelme-Fontes (Alguazas, Palmar, Torre Pacheco), are referenced. Their relation is markedly a vertical one based on clientelism and patronage.

Likewise, the records contain a description of the witnesses of these legal events. The recurrent presence of some of the individuals at different events is worth noting, and although it is difficult to know their social status, the Don can denote that they are professionals such as scribes, notaries or procuradores.<sup>90</sup> This is evidence of the closed relations with the middle- to high-level status that was entering the social pyramid of the ancien régime. Other witnesses included individuals educated in law and letters emerging at a time when lawsuits and other judicial issues were overwhelming the Tribunales de Justicia Ordinarios, the Chancillería and the Consejo Real. Inheritance and intrafamilial disputes and complaints resulting from issues with mayorazgos were filling up the tribunales, a topic that chapter four examines further.

Witnesses used for purity of blood examinations to become regidor were commonly individuals closely related – sometimes with a direct kinship relation to the main actor, even when it was known that relatives were not allowed to testify in favour of the candidate. Witnesses were generally oligarchic urban figures who, as tables 3.11 and 3.12 show, have family names that have a close link to the main actor through other types of economic, social, religious or political venues.

Records like reports from meetings and cabildos of Cofradías, such as that of the nobles of Santiago de la Espada or the Cofradía pasionaria Nuestro Padre Jesús Nazareno, represent a key space of the elite's sociability and thus provide clues to help analyse more broadly the Riquelme's social network. These sources do not only identify individuals; they also document the social status of all the individuals connected to the Riquelme. The difference between tables 3.12 and 3.13 is mainly about the social origins of individuals related to Antonio Fontes Paz. In earlier years he was frequently related to individuals such as procuradores or lawyers of the middle social strata who assisted him in judicial processes, or with labourers and peasants who rented his lands. Later, as table 3.13 shows, Fontes Paz appeared related to equals in the Cofradías of Santiago de la Espada and Nuestro Padre Jesús Nazareno, creating a closed oligarchic body.

Table 3.14 situates Antonio Fontes Riquelme (third marquis of Torre Pacheco) at the centre in order to map the relationships that emerged with other relevant family names as well as the cabildos and meetings in which he participated annually as one of the main members of the cofradías. The members of the Cofradía of Santiago de la Espada were part of the elite, given the fact that all members had passed a purity of blood examination. Most important, however, are the relationships documented in the cabildos and meetings of the Cofradía of Santiago with the members of Nuestro Padre Jesús Nazareno, with members coming both from the middle and high social strata.

The Cofradía of Nuestro Padre Jesús Nazareno experienced a process of ennoblement in the eighteenth century as members from the Cofradía of Santiago became members of both (see graph 3.1). Records from meetings and cabildos of mayordomos show elite surnames from illustrious people, titulados, regidores and high clergy individuals. Ennoblement deepened in the nineteenth century as a result of a substitution effect between the cofradías – the cabildos of Santiago became smaller, with the last one in 1820, while the ones for Nuestro Padre Jesús continued with many of the members coming from other cofradías, including main family members of the Murcian oligarchy.<sup>93</sup> The data show the cabildos and meetings in which Don Antonio Riquelme y Fontes (lord of Guadalupe) participated as a key member of the cofradías. Riquelme y Fontes became mayordomo in Santiago and dean mayordomo in Nuestro Padre Jesús on 10 May 1812.<sup>94</sup> Although in the early nineteenth century the meetings of Nuestro Padre Jesús were often crowded, eventually, as the century progressed, its membership decreased. Through time, however, some of its participants continued to come from the top illustrious families.

At certain times, only members of the Riquelme-Fontes lineage attended cabildos in the early to mid-nineteenth century. The oligarchy was still part of a process of social closing and only socialising in elite spaces. The social network of Antonio Riquelme y Fontes (see figure 3.8, and appendix pp. 300, 301) shows the continuity and permanence of some social patterns, and of the stagnation in the Murcian oligarchy that clung to institutions such as cofradías to avoid any reduction of their socioeconomic power in the nineteenth century. The reforms that were implemented to establish a more liberal and open society were far from breaking the social fabric that the urban elite had built around concepts such as the group's interest, solidarities, clientelism, friendship and patronage. Indeed, such a process must be understood in the framework of the longue durée.<sup>95</sup>

Family and Entailed Estate (Mayorazgo): First-borns as Keepers of the Family's Economic Power

4.1. The History and Origins of the Mayorazgo, 1507–1841

Established by the thirteenth century in Castile and later in Portugal,<sup>1</sup> the mayorazgo was fundamentally an institution with strict links to the property of the nobility that allowed neither emphyteusis nor the ability of the monarchy to confiscate the property.<sup>2</sup> The first-born male was the mayorazgo's main pillar – the ego or jefe-patrón of the lineage. The family's patrimony was mostly linked to the ego to avoid its fragmentation and dispersal. The first-born was the main beneficiary – the other siblings were always second – and everyone surrounding him was concerned with securing the continuity and perpetuation of the lineage at all levels.

Through the mayorazgo, families of the elite put in practice all kinds of marriage strategies to secure the possession of lands and properties attached to a mayorazgo, and also to restrict enough closeness of parentela to avoid anyone taking over, in case there was any interruption of the biological line of consanguine heirs. It was a structure that transferred patrimony in the most vertical and condensed way that the Castilian laws could allow, and showed, represented and materialised both the consciousness of the lineage as well as the cultural symbols that were the social baggage of the different lineages. It entailed all the lineage ever wanted: to exist in perpetuity.<sup>3</sup>

This perfectly defined in the Iberian kingdoms the concept of the mayorazgo – where the vertical wins over any horizontal hereditary line, though the latter is also used through alliances and marriage strategies to enlarge the parentela within the oligarchy and to maintain and increase the social status of the group. As such, two concepts also became key, one connected to the authority of the pariente mayor (eldest son and main heir) who secured the cohesion of the members of the lineage; in European Mediterranean communities, everyone understood what roles each person played around him, with the group's interest always a priority.<sup>4</sup> Second was the preservation of the wealth of the family, which conferred on the first-born power over the patrimony, given his succession rights.<sup>5</sup>

The mayorazgo remained important in the Spanish monarchy through the late medieval era, during the early modern period and even into the early nineteenth century. There was what can be called a 'culture of mayorazgo' in the lineage, making the first-born the head and guide of the family group.<sup>6</sup> The patrón led, protected and benefited the group. He also provided an extended, though not uniform, spiritual parentela. The system of patronage was thus structured through clientele relationships that were inherited from medieval forms of subordination.<sup>7</sup> As figure 4.1 suggests, the Castilian system of inheritance was nominally egalitarian. However, by observing how the family assets are distributed through the legítima, 1/5 de libre disposición and 1/3 de mejora, it is difficult to assure such equity.

Although the Castilian inheritance system was, on the surface, egalitarian,<sup>8</sup> the entire set of properties of the family patrimony was divided in three parts. From two of these parts, half (51%) of the inheritance was for the legítima, the universal heirs, in equal terms. Another section of these two-thirds, 16% called the 1/5 de libre disposición, was put aside to pay any debts or funerary expenses. The other third, called 1/3 de mejora, was in place to maintain control over the family patrimony. A set of strategies or arreglos was determined for this part of the inheritance to avoid dispersal of any common ownership. The father or the mother had the right to decide how to use this part to benefit one of the children by making a mejora (or improvement).<sup>9</sup>

The equality of the system was only superficial, however, because the head of the family employed a set of mechanisms and strategies that undermined it.<sup>10</sup> In most cases, especially in wealthy and powerful families of the urban oligarchy, there were practices in place that sought to keep the family patrimony together. The mayorazgo appeared when the one-third de mejora and the one-fifth de libre disposición became one. As noted above, the main objective was to protect and benefit the first-born – the jefe-patrón of the lineage – with the other siblings relegated to second place, the segundones, under his tutelage.

In 1505 in the Crown of Castile, the Cortes of Toro institutionalised this structure, regulating the lineage as a kinship system that favoured a vertical line of descent.<sup>11</sup> The horizontal line did not disappear, however, as it remained within endogamy – unions of direct cousins or between uncles and nieces or aunts and nephews that broke the generational line – and with double marriages that united two members of one prestigious family with two members of one of equal or higher social status, so that the social prestige of one of the families was elevated (see figure 4.2).<sup>12</sup> In Mediterranean Europe, all this was fuelled with the objective of maintaining the family patrimony intact and in order to keep socially reproducing the iron-strong lineage group.

Pérez Picazo notes that the mayorazgo originated in the Roman juridical formula of fideicommissum, ‘a plan sealed in a will or an acta capitular or a foundation letter that the founder [of the fideicommissum] creates to determine how a group of properties and rights will pass from him to his heirs’.<sup>13</sup> The creation of a connection or tie (vínculum) established that a patrimony is indivisible and inalienable, and that the owner has the right to the usufruct but not the capital. In addition, the principle of primogeniture became the main pillar of the succession order.

The process for the foundation of a mayorazgo in the Crown of Castile during the early modern period was tightly regulated. First,

A. Marriage between brother-in-law and sister-in-law (A&amp;C)

B. Marriage between cousins (C&amp;D)

C. Marriage between uncle and niece (E&amp;C)

the person received a licencia real to become judicially authorised to create a mayoralazgo. The document itself had the following structure: the preamble that lays out a declaration of principles; the body, that mentions the linked patrimony or patrimonio vinculado; and thirdly, an explanation of the succession order that in the majority of the cases is agnático, keeping the right of succession for the first-born male and thus establishing that after the death of the founding father of the mayorazgo the patrimony will stay within the lineage.<sup>14</sup> The succession order was not always thoroughly understood, or it was not well explained in the foundation documents, which led segundones and other collateral branches of the lineage to claim their rights in the succession of the mayorazgo. This inundated the Tribunales de Justicia Ordinarios (regional courts), the Reales Chancillerías in Granada or Valladolid, and the highest-level court, the Consejo de Castilla, with lawsuits about ownership (tenuta) and possession of mayorazgos. The cases usually started in issues of succession between female and male siblings, or because of the incompatibility of owning more than one mayorazgo. Also, the suits often were brought forward by members of the same family, which created intrafamilial conflicts that were prolonged for extended periods of time. The mayorazgo, as an important source of income and also of prestige and social and political status, was at the centre of landowner family politics, especially for the segundones.

In this context, family names became key to family and inheritance politics. The founding documents of the mayorazgo established that to receive the family's patrimony the successor needed to have the family name, which also secured the family's memory over time, generation after generation. Litigants often claimed and even invented their right to inheritance based on having a direct relationship to a certain surname. To avoid fraud, judges required notarial records such as parish records, baptismal, marriage, death and memorial documents that could show extensive genealogies. Even so, these documents were sometimes forged or included false information. If falsity was suspected, the only certain proof would be the will or the foundation letter of the mayorazgo in which the founder had outlined the succession line, though this was also often open to interpretation by the litigants.

Settling inheritance cases took a long time in many instances. Protracted cases, however, provide key information about how the Riquelme family patrimonies changed over time, both in quantitative terms and also regarding the social and biological stagnation that the lineage ended up suffering as a result of the enclosed nature of the nobility group. The estado señorial was defined through the mayorazgo, and as such through the social and power relations that were generated by them.<sup>15</sup> The following section superposes the life of the mayorazgo, from its foundation in the early 1500s until 1844, when it was outlawed, with the history of the Riquelme patrimony, exploring the processes of accumulation, modification and circulation of property through generations.

4.1.1. Family Heritage, Life-cycle and Circulation of Land Property: Wealth Accumulation

The end of the reconquest war against the Nasrid kingdom of Granada in 1492 meant the cessation of violence in formerly frontier lands in the Crown of Castile and the end of Muslim incursions that many peasants and labourers had endured for centuries. In addition, families began to work the lands they had received as compensation for their role in the war, or those new parcels that they purchased. Peace and conquest meant the beginning of a process of greater land accumulation for noble landowners in Murcia – including the Riquelme lineage – which they maintained throughout the late medieval and early modern period.

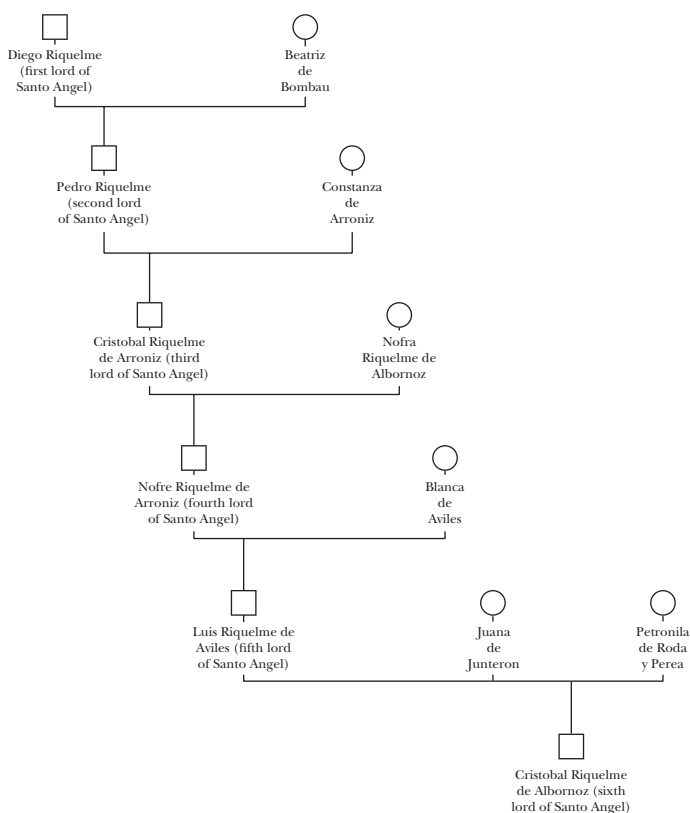

Noble prestige and power revolved around land, and also water when living in a dry region like Murcia, where droughts were common, as in the señorío of Santo Ángel, parts of which the Riquelme had owned since before the mid-fifteenth century, when Diego Riquelme became the first lord of Santo Ángel.<sup>16</sup> Santo Ángel contained extensive parts of orchard and fruit trees. Other known lineages had also acquired lands in surrounding areas such as Ceutí, Alguazas, Cotillas, and Archena in the valley of the Segura river, which were also parts of señoríos.<sup>17</sup>

The lands that the Riquelme began to add to their patrimony after conquest were mostly dry lands of the kingdom of Granada, the lands north of the district of Lorca – largely lands in Campo Coy, next to Caravaca and Cehegín, that the Fajardo donated to the Riquelme lineage at the beginning of the sixteenth century, which they rotated for agriculture with what they already owned in Murcia.<sup>18</sup> Still, Coy and other strategic locations such as Celda, Nogalte and Aguaderas had some water sources or fountains, and the nobility carefully selected these sites to enhance their socio-economic status, and came to be known as señores del agua (lords of the water).<sup>19</sup> Thus the Riquelme lineage went a step up in the oligarchy when Diego Riquelme Dávalos became first lord of the señorío of Campo Coy and had control over the waters of the Lorca Orchard.<sup>20</sup>

The family, as the consolidating and transmitting channel of feudal property, was at the centre of the nobility.<sup>21</sup> Thereby, the mayoralazgo became key to the perpetuation and social reproduction of these elite landowners. Riquelme property presents such a linear circulation of the land over time – the señorío of Santo Ángel, which was already extensive when founded in 1544 by Don Cristóbal Riquelme de Arroniz (third lord of Santo Ángel) and his wife Doña Nofra Riquelme and passed to their first-born, Nofre Riquelme de Arroniz (fourth lord of Santo Ángel), remained within the lineage for two centuries (see figure 4.3 and table 4.1).<sup>22</sup>

Although modifications and additions always required the king's permission, the life path of the mayorazgo was generally linear. Don Luis Riquelme de Avilés (fifth lord of Santo Ángel) inherited all these properties (see tables 4.1 and 4.2) and added them in 1617 to the mayorazgo that Cristóbal Riquelme de Arroniz had founded before.<sup>23</sup> Luis Riquelme's will stated that the properties of the mayorazgo should eventually be in the hands of his nephew Don Cristóbal Riquelme de Arroniz (sixth lord of Santo Ángel), son of Don Cristóbal Riquelme Comontes (fourth lord of Coy) and Doña Antonia de Arroniz Riquelme. In quantitative terms, the value of the Riquelme mayorazgo was significant, and thus their power within the Murcian oligarchy was clear. These possessions and the economic value that they represented were even more important in times of stagnation and scarcity, or when plagues and wars destroyed the crops.

The señorío of Santo Ángel was diverse, with irrigated lands of great value by the Segura river and drier lands in the Campo of Cartagena. Overall, though there were more dry lands, the señorío was of great value in the mostly dry region of Murcia. Legally it was under an emphyteusis right, which made it, in theory, closer to the type of mayorazgos that existed in the Catalan and Valencian regions. The Castilian mayorazgos prohibited these practices, for example.<sup>24</sup> This clause is what explains Cristóbal Riquelme de Arroniz (sixth lord of Santo Ángel) renting lands from the mayorazgo that Cristóbal Riquelme de Arroniz (third lord of Santo Ángel) founded.<sup>25</sup>

The lands that Don Diego Riquelme de Comontes (third lord of Coy) and his spouse Doña Beatriz de Bustamante joined in 1590 were partly from the heredamiento of Coy in the city of Lorca next to atalaya and callado llanto, and also part of Cehegín and Caravaca, and of the heredad and hacienda of the youngest son of Nicolás

Natarlo.<sup>27</sup> The combination of lands, which secured wooded lands and water sources, came from what Don Diego received from his uncle, Don Cristóbal Riquelme de Comontes, in 1558 through a letter of donation and mejora to his son Don Cristóbal Riquelme. The Riquelme family had other possessions in Coy like the heredamiento of the chanfre of Santa Iglesia of Cartagena and the residence in Murcia of Don Pedro Hurtado de Mendoza (see figure 4.4). The lands were donated and given to Don Pedro Rodríguez de Avilés, son of Don Diego Riquelme de Avilés and Doña Constanza de Bernal.

This set of territory was purchased from the Santo Oficio of the Inquisition, and it included water, paths, rivers, ways out and entries, uses, rights and serfdom practices that were in place before.<sup>28</sup> Water resources were essential, strategic areas within the descriptions of the lands, and regardless of the scarcity of water in some of these areas, prestigious, important individuals of Lorca's oligarchy were landowners there.<sup>29</sup> To expand their power, the Riquelme combined lands where the main water sources were located in Coy, regardless of their low quality, which in some instances limited cultivation and rotation. To own water in arid regions was 'at the same time a symbol of misery and wealth' – in periods of drought water sources were fundamental just for survival.<sup>30</sup>

Santo Ángel and Campo Coy became one under the mayoralazgo of Don Cristóbal Riquelme y Arroniz, fifth lord of Coy and Sixth of Santo Ángel (see table 4.3 and figure 4.5), and also the main source of income for the Riquelme family. As such, to manage and own part of the mayoralzgos was a constant matter of discordant and conflictive relationships within the lineage. There were numerous judicial cases and lawsuits to control these lands, and increasingly so after the death of Cristóbal Riquelme y Arroniz's heir, his daughter Juana Riquelme. Generation after generation presented their cases and claims to be confirmed as legitimate owners and heirs of the mayoralzgos at the Chancillería de Granada and the Consejo de Castilla, and all the while the lands continued to be an extremely important source of wealth for the entire family (see table 4.4 and graph 4.1).

Possessing land and its production was not only the oligarchy's means of survival, but also the most significant source of wealth in European pre-industrial societies and the most important source of power for the landowning nobility.<sup>35</sup> The Riquelme's corpus of lands, along with the peasants who worked them and paid for other usage rights, lay both in Murcia and outside the kingdom, and they were consolidated as a result of a strictly rigorous and diligent strategy of marriage alliances.

An example was the union between the Riquelme and the family name Muñoz de Robles. It began in 1621 when Juan Pedro Muñoz de Robles and María Riquelme de Arroniz, the daughter of Cristóbal Riquelme de Comontes (fourth lord of Coy) and of Antonia de Arroniz Riquelme, married (see figure 4.6).<sup>36</sup> The Riquelme combined both mayorazgos with this marriage, the one that Pedro Muñoz founded in Caravaca in 1577, and the one that Juan de Robles started in 1557 (see figure 4.7 and 4.8).<sup>37</sup> Both mayorazgos gathered lands in Lorca, Campo Coy, where the Riquelme already had property, and in Caravaca, from where the family of Muñoz y Robles came. One marriage after another, the Riquelme ended up acquiring and extending patrimony through the formerly borderland region.

In Pedro Muñoz's foundation documents of his mayorazgo, he stated that Doña Isabel Muñoz, his daughter from his marriage with Francisca Calvetes, would be the first in the succession line to inherit the lands. Isabel was illegitimate, however, as she had been born when her parents were not yet married, and thus Pedro requested from the king a legitimization letter (provided in 1568) so that his daughter could inherit his possessions. The royal requests and all other strategies had to comply with the Muñoz's precedences – their commercial activities and professional positions as scribes or procuradores made them subject to accusations of being Jewish (explained before in chapter two). Another source of evidence for this is Pedro's foundational clauses that stated that Isabel had to marry 'a hijodalgo and person of pure blood'.<sup>38</sup> The best alternative to erasing these stains from the family name's memory was to marry into the Murcian elite. For social promotion, Muñoz individuals married members of the Riquelme family. In exchange, the Riquelme gained land patrimony in the Caravaca area and introduced family names that were in a phase of social ascension as part of their clientele. Land was a symbol of wealth; blood and honour conferred social status. Combined together they provided the oligarchy with an aura of power that translated into social and economic prestige: a symbolic capital that materialised in economic terms through the large returns that the lands generated.

Parents could also choose to confer social and economic status advancement to their children. Juan de Robles and Catalina Musso (in the Riquelme lineage) improved the status of their children in the collective will awarded in Caravaca on 15 November 1557. Their son, Juan de Robles, received an irrigated heredad and its house in Prados, Caravaca, from his father; the other child, Luis de Robles, received 1,000 ducados from the mother and lands that were his father's as well as three fanegas of serrado and a vineyard heredad.<sup>39</sup> An additional clause mentioned that the first to die left 1,000 ducados of mejora as well as a spiritual requirement always to commemorate the souls of the parents Juan de Robles and Catalina Musso during each Christmas Day mass.

The cobdicio of Juan de Robles, signed in Caravaca on 1 September 1563, was even more explicit on this clause.<sup>40</sup> It required that in perpetuity, on all Fridays and Saturdays there was a mass or a mention in church of the souls of Juan de Robles, Catalina Musso and their parents. The charge of 30 ducados for these remembrances could be taken from the income their lands generated. Another mandate was to name a capellán of their blood, or if not of pure blood, showing how the foundation of capellanías that were pious memories linked in perpetuity to a group of properties, was a common practice and of great socioeconomic and religious value in the oligarchy.<sup>41</sup>

Both Pedro Muñoz's and Juan de Robles and Catalina de Musso's mayorazgos ended up in the hands of Juan Pedro Muñoz de Robles. When he married María Riquelme de Arroniz, the possessions were then inserted into the Riquelme lineage, on which this chapter will later focus as litigation around the mayorazgos, Juan Pedro and the Riquelme lineage became of great relevance. In this regard, it is important to note that the generations after Pedro Muñoz did not follow the line of transfer that he established as founder of the mayorazgo, even though it was mandatory and written in the clauses of the foundation to follow the founder's premises.

The line of succession was not fully respected. Catalina Musso, Juan de Robles's spouse and daughter of Pedro Muñoz, ended up receiving the mayorazgo and both groups' possessions, Muñoz's and Robles's, combined under the same family umbrella (see table 4.5 and 4.6). It was another instance of the bucle matrimonial practice, which enclosed both patrimonies under one family group.<sup>46</sup> Though such a transfer might have caused litigation among lineage members, there is no evidence that any of them, for the group's interest, resorted to the courts to solve the breach of the mayorazgo obligations.

There were other important lands located in the Orchard of Murcia that were attached to the mayorazgos which also followed the Valencian and Catalan oligarchic property model. The properties in the regions of La Ñora and Guadalupe were part of the mayorazgo that the racioneros and canónigos of the Cartagena cathedral, the brothers Luis and Macías Coque Riquelme had founded on 15 January 1559.<sup>47</sup> To add to the bundle, Macías Coque had also founded a census-linked capellanía.<sup>48</sup> As they developed, mayorazgos in the region of Murcia followed the oligarchy's interests and tended to be different from the Castilian model, which did not allow linked properties to be in the census.

The trajectory of the mayorazgo that Macías Coque Riquelme received shows this pattern of the perpetuation of patrimony within the confines of the family and familial connections. He was the nephew of Luis and Macías Coque and son of Don Alonso Riquelme and Inés Coque, and he married Constanza Riquelme de Avilés. When Don Alonso Riquelme died in 1559 and Macías Coque Riquelme married Doña Constanza, the clergymen Macías and Luis Coque founded a new mayorazgo, but under the condition of being able to receive its income and forgo the legítimas materna and paterna in favour of Macías's brother and regidor, Bernardino Riquelme. Bernardino received another linked property from his brother and arcediano of the Cartagena church, Fabricio Riquelme.<sup>49</sup> All these transactions and mechanisms, used to build up kinship and lineage, also contributed to perpetuating and reproducing the ideals that were the common denominator of the traditional Castilian elite.<sup>50</sup> The accumulation of patrimony started with the family (and in relation to other families) as the central structure, travelled within the family, following a horizontal line through siblings and vertical descendants through uncles and aunts and nephews and nieces, and stayed in the family.

Marriage alliances were thus fundamental to the Riquelme lineage, and to the oligarchy in general, to consolidate socio-economic power and increase their wealth. Another example was the connection with the Almela y Tomás families through the marriage of Cristóbal Riquelme Muñoz de Robles, son of María Riquelme y Arroniz and Juan Pedro Muñoz de Robles, to Francisca Almela y Tomás, daughter of Pablo Fulgencio de Almela y Junco and Laura Fontes y Avilés, in the mid-sixteenth century.<sup>51</sup> For the couple, Doña Francisca of the Riquelme lineage negotiated the merger of the mayorazgo that Don Juan de Junco (treasurer of the Santo Oficio and regidor of Murcia) and his spouse Doña Francisca Ballester, residents of Murcia, founded on 3 July 1627 (see figure 4.9). The same happened with the mayorazgos of Diego Tomás de Oluja, knight of Alcántara, founded around the same time, and the one that Doña Fabiana Salad y Anduga and Alonso Almela y Arroniz, knight of Calatrava's spouse, also residents of Murcia founded in January 1622 (see figure 4.10).<sup>52</sup>

4.1.1.1. Riquelme-Fontes: Wealth Accumulation through Antonio Fontes Paz (third marquis of Torre Pacheco)

The union with the Fontes lineage was without a doubt the most profitable one for the Riquelme group. Several mayoralzgos ended up under the Riquelme name through marriages with the Fontes families and also through other indirect connections with this family name. Don Antonio Fontes Paz, third marquis of Torre Pacheco, was at the centre of many of the unions between both families, making possible most of their patrimony accumulation from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries. Particularly, the marriage between Don Antonio Fontes Paz and Doña Francisca Riquelme y Buendía, and their heir Joaquín Fontes Riquelme, fourth marquis of Torre Pacheco, marked the beginning of the accumulation of a large group of properties under the Riquelme family.<sup>55</sup> Examples of patrimonies coming together in the period were the mayoralzgo (founded in February, 1538) of residents of Murcia Don Diego Riquelme de Avilés and his spouse Doña Constanza de Bernal, which their first-born, Gonzalo Rodríguez de Avilés, inherited and combined with the large patrimony of Doña Isabel Fontes (see figure 4.11). Gonzalo's brother, Pedro Rodríguez de Avilés, received the mayoralzgo that Don Pedro Hurtado de Mendoza (chantre of the cathedral) founded in 1558 (see figure 4.12). Also, Onofre Fontes de Albornoz and his spouse

Doña Isabel Pagán Riquelme founded a vínculo and a mayorazgo for their son, Don Baltasar Fontes de Alborno, in 1593 (see figure 4.13 and table 4.9).<sup>56</sup>

Founding mayorazgos provided great authority over the land, and founders of the agglomerations of territories rigorously scheduled its distribution, what was to be built on the land and the official positions to be created in that space. The mayorazgo that Don Alonso de Paz founded for his son Don Alonso de Paz in the villa of Frejenal in 1597, where he also founded the Colegio de la Compañía de Jesús (Society of Jesus College) and two capellanías on the monastery of Nuestra Señora de la Paz de Frejenal, was also part of this group of patrimonial land that the Riquelme lineage eventually accumulated.<sup>61</sup> The three mandas pías (pious mandates) received 1,000 ducados a year to spend on wheat and salaries, and 500 ducados that each year for twenty years should be donated to the colleges and seminaries of Seville and Valladolid. The founder also decided who had the power to name positions – he ordered his son Alonso de Paz to name the founder's brother licenciado Francisco Rodríguez de Paz the capellán, for example.

The stipulations that founders of mayorazgos provided reinforced their power and memory through generations, and in the case of the Paz family, the creation of Catholic institutions in Frejenal de la Sierra (Extremadura) and other patronage campaigns helped erase their possible connection with Jewish communities that once lived in the area.

Antonio Fontes Paz ended up inheriting the mayorazgo after the union of the Fontes and the Paz families (see figure 4.14), who socialised with other members of the oligarchy in the villa and royal court of Madrid.<sup>62</sup> It was one of the most significant examples of patrimony within the Riquelme-Fontes, with juros, censos and high tributes such as commercial taxes like the almojarifazgo on sales and purchases (alcabalas) and important incomes such as the marquis of Pliego's mayorazgo.<sup>63</sup> The entire dominion covered the diverse territories of the jurisdiction of the district of Seville (see table 4.10).

The mayorazgos of the Rocamora family, one of the most important oligarchic Valencian families, and other illustrious names of Orihuela in the kingdom of Valencia, also came under the Riquelme-Fontes dominion. The Paz and the Rocamora examples demonstrate one more time how rigorous marriage strategies were when the most important goal was to increase and strengthen the socioeconomic power of the lineage. Don Jaime de Rocamora, born and resident of Orihuela, founded a mayorazgo in favour of his daughter Doña Isabel de Rocamora y Ruíz on 22 June 1612 (see figure 4.15 and table 4.11). The family owned a capellanía in the parish of Santa Justa y Rufina, with an altar to San Nicolás de Bari.<sup>65</sup>

Doña Ana de Moya, resident and regidor of Caravaca and Don Diego Melgarejo Riquelme's spouse, founded a mayorazgo (see figure 4.16) with properties of the heredad of the Moral's fountain in 1629 for her son Don Francisco Muñoz Melgarejo (alférez mayor of Caravaca).<sup>69</sup> After a transfer of properties of the mayorazgo of Macías Fontes, first marquis of Torre Pacheco's spouse Doña Ana Melgarejo, it all came into the ownership of the marquises of Torre Pacheco.<sup>70</sup>

On 21 January 1631, Don Juan Damián de la Peraleja, a resident of Murcia, founded a mayorazgo in favour of his granddaughter Doña Dionisia Galtero, married to Don Diego Melgarejo de Mora, and the daughter of Doña María de la Peraleja and Don Diego Martínez Galtero Melgarejo.<sup>72</sup> This group of properties from the Peraleja family, located in the Orchard of Murcia, also ended up under the Riquelme-Fontes as a result of the marriage between the daughter of Dionisia Galtero and Diego Melgarejo, Ana Ceferina Melgarejo y Galtero, to Macías Fontes Carrillo (first marquis of Torre Pacheco).

Not very long after the foundation of the Peraleja mayoralazgo (see figure 4.17, 4.18 and table 4.12), Don Juan Damián de la Peraleja's brother, Don Antonio de la Peraleja (knight of Alcántara and regidor of Murcia), in his testament of 1655, added a new group of properties

(three-quarters of water and lands from the heredamiento of Sangonera la Verde) to the vínculo.<sup>76</sup> Another mayorazgo worth mentioning is the one that Don Bernardino Fontes de Albornoz Riquelme (see figure 4.19), a resident of Murcia and canónigo of the cathedral, founded in his will of 1642, which linked all the properties (one heredad in the Pago de Churra with moreales or mulberry trees, vineyards, houses, palaces and the rest in 100 tahúllas) to his brother Don Fabricio Fontes de Albornoz Riquelme.<sup>77</sup>

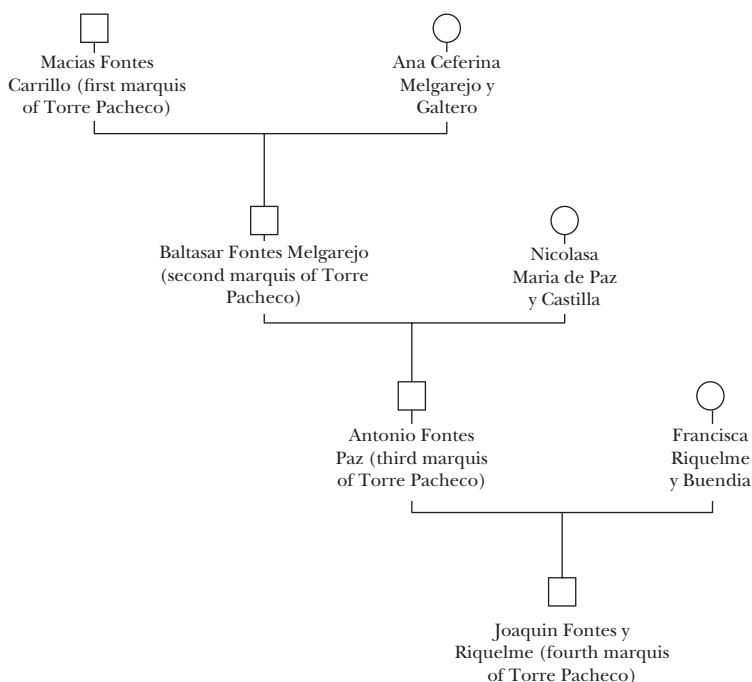

Furthermore, Don Macías Fontes Carrillo, first marquis of Torre Pacheco, who had already caused all the mayorazgos to end up in the hands of his first-born, Baltasar Fontes Melgarejo, second marquis of Torre Pacheco, advanced his son's status even more by founding a new vínculo in 1702 (see table 4.13 and figure 4.20).<sup>78</sup>

Don Alejandro Fontes, Baltasar Fontes Melgarejo (second marquis of Torre Pacheco)'s brother, founded on 1 November 1718 a valuable mayorazgo to be transferred to his son Baltasar Fontes Paz.<sup>82</sup> When Baltasar died in February 1757, his brother Antonio (third marquis of Torre Pacheco) inherited it. With lands in the Orchard of Murcia and in the villa of Archena, and later with more aggregations, it became one of the most profitable lands for the Riquelme-Fontes lineage (see figure 4.21 and table 4.14 and 4.15).<sup>83</sup>

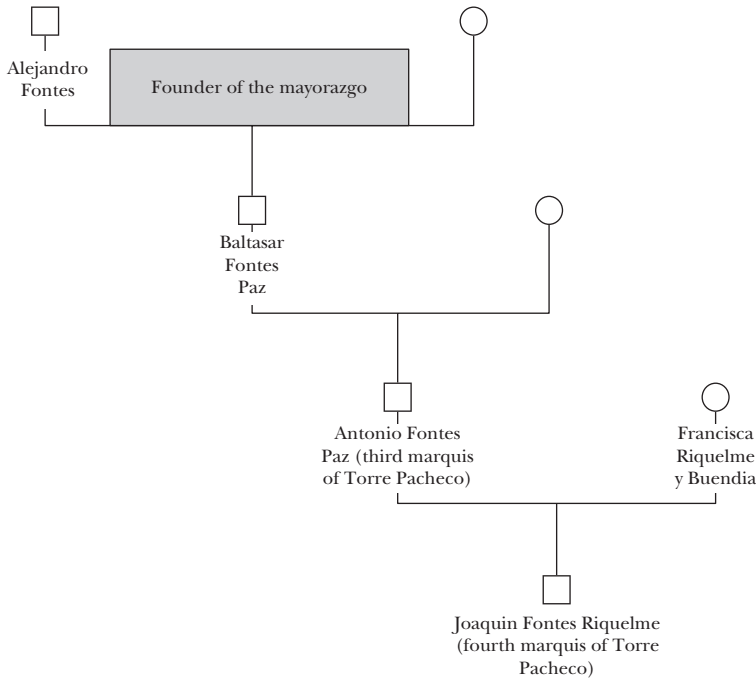

The last link in the line of descendants of the marquises of Torre Pacheco was the mayorazgo that Juan Marín Blázquez founded for his eldest son, Don Juan Marín Blázquez de Valdés in 1599 (see table 4.16).<sup>84</sup> The line of transfer that made this vínculo come under the Riquelme-Fontes lineage is unclear, but most likely it was from the union of the Fontes family with the Carrillo Marín surname, which then ended up with Joaquín Fontes Riquelme (fourth marquis of Torre Pacheco).

The lands of Antonio Fontes Paz, third marquis of Torre Pacheco, mostly in the Orchard of Murcia, were not only large, but they also provided substantial income revenue for the family. The possession of such a vast group of properties, however, could also lead to abandoned and unproductive lands, which then became expensive for the family to repair. Repairing lands and their estate also required royal permission, as happened in 1757 with the houses of some ruined mayorazgos in the parish of Santa María de Murcia. Though the mayorazgo's revenue amounted to 6,000 ducados, the restoration of the houses required 9,000 ducados. Antonio Fontes Paz had 77,113 reales de vellón saved in the Depositaria General of Madrid since 1737 from the mayorazgo that the house of the duke of Medinaceli had founded.<sup>89</sup> Repairing mayorazgos and vínculos that had been created and accumulated over the years was an arduous task, and it represented a real economic burden for the oligarchy.

Possession and maintenance of the lands also created intrafamilial litigation – second siblings were often offended at seeing their interests undermined in favour of the first-born son. Mayorazgo founders, ideally, mediated and adjudicated measures to avoid such disputes, so that many family members could enjoy their inheritance.<sup>90</sup> It was common for the founder's spouse to create other mayorazgos of less value for the rest of the siblings, mostly, the daughters, thus avoiding familial or kinship frictions. Doña Catalina de Avilés y Fajardo founded a vínculo and a mayorazgo (see table 4.17) for her daughter Doña Laura Fontes in 1641, arguing that 'Don Baltasar Fontes, my youngest son, has and possesses many properties in mayorazgo to sustain his houses, and my daughter Doña Laura Fontes does not have a thing'.<sup>91</sup> Francisca Riquelme y Buendía, the spouse of Antonio Fontes Paz (third marquis of Torre Pacheco), also looked after her daughter's future and economic standing by founding a vínculo in 1783. Doña Segunda Fontes Riquelme, Francisca's and Antonio's daughter, received a house in Trapería Street of the parish of Santa María valued at 42,000 reales de vellón and a heredad of Velablanca in the partido of Pacheco (Campo de Cartagena), valued at 41,346 reales and 16 maravedíes.<sup>92</sup>

Intentions to improve the circumstances of segundones did not always result in easy relationships among siblings. Adding to Segunda's vínculo and to repair the main house, her husband Don Juan José Fernández de la Reguera invested 9,867 reales and 29 maravedíes and her father Don Antonio Fontes Paz contributed 14,965 reales and 29 maravedíes.<sup>94</sup> Such capitalisations, as the next section will demonstrate, were not enough to avoid disputes over the possession of mayorazgos and litigation and suits within the lineage.

4.1.2. Entailed Estate: Strength or Weakness of the Main Heir? The Lawsuit vs. Riquelme Salafranca

Transfer of possessions and inheritance within the oligarchy often followed a vertical rather than a horizontal line – the first-born clearly accumulated the greatest and more important mayorazgos and their additions. Did this tendency make the house (family name) stagnate or enervate over time? There is a significant chance that it did, but it was the role of the segundones, the second siblings, their interests and the collateral relations they formed that generated the crudest disputes around the first-born.

Within the idea of primogeniture, questioning the authority of the pariente mayor, the potestad of the lineage's head, meant a breach at the centre of the group. As M. C. Gerbet puts it, friction started when segundones began questioning the authority of the first-born.<sup>95</sup> Given the multiplication of family lines, lineages were often at the point of rupture. The mayorazgo warranted consolidated and conglomerated patrimonies, and also had an accumulative effect that resulted in pejorative and biased decisions on the rights of the segundones over family possessions.<sup>96</sup>

There were two main mayoralzgos of the Riquelme lineage that came from the conglomerates founded by Don Cristóbal Riquelme de Arroniz (third lord of Santo Ángel) and his spouse Doña Nofra Riquelme de Arroniz in 1544, along with the addition of Don Luis Riquelme y Avilés (fifth lord of Santo Ángel) in 1617, and the mayoralzgo of Don Diego Riquelme de Comontes (third lord of Coy) and his wife Doña Isabel de Bustamante, founded in 1590. Both main sections of the lineage, the Campo Coy and the Santo Ángel, joined in the figure of Don Cristóbal Riquelme y Arroniz (fifth lord of Coy and sixth lord of Santo Ángel), and from this point onward the disputes within the lineage about the maintenance and possession of the mayoralzgos unfolded.

The mayoralzgos coalesced in Doña Juana Riquelme, Don Francisco Rocamora's spouse, and only daughter and heir of Don Cristóbal Riquelme. After her death in 1670, an era of frequent litigation began, wherein generation after generation of different Riquelme family members sought legal recognition and legitimation over the ownership of the mayoralzgos. It was a tense and difficult time for the lineage that continued until the 1830s, full of accusations among members of the group, and one that had no easy resolution.<sup>97</sup> Only the decisions of the high courts, the Chancillería de Granada and the Consejo de Castilla, which were often the result of long judicial processes that the litigants contested over and over again, concluded the litigations well in the nineteenth century.

4.1.2.1. Overuse of the Family Name as Key Element in Lawsuits for the Land

In these judicial processes, the principle of no-confusión, stated in a bill of 1543 in the Crown of Castile that prohibited the coexistence of two mayoralzgos of more than two million maravedíes under one head only, prevailed. In addition, the 1543 laws as well as the regulations at the Courts of Toro of 1504 mandated that the holder of such mayoralzgos had to have the name, surname and armas (coat of arms) of the house.<sup>98</sup> These elements are recalled insistently in the litigation, demonstrating not only the material side of the generational transmission, but also the dynasty type of transfer. The name, surname and armas of the founder are vertically transmitted as immaterial patrimony to preserve the memory of the lineage and of the founder of the house.

The Castilian law, although clear about accumulation of mayorazgos, was also lenient. It was common in the nobility to want to accumulate lands under a handful of family names to preserve the memory of the mayorazgos they possessed.<sup>99</sup> There is evidence that shows that family names were mixed or intentionally hidden so that only one individual appeared as the legitimate owner of the mayorazgos. Each of the mayorazgos that were going to be for Don Antonio Fontes Paz (third marquis of Torre Pacheco) had different family names attached, though all named him as the only legitimate owner:<sup>100</sup> Antonio Alonso de Paz Rodríguez de Avilés Coque y Fontes, Antonio Alonso Gonzalo de Paz Rodríguez de Avilés Coque Fontes y Peraleja, Antonio Alonso Gonzalo de Paz Rodríguez de Avilés Coque Hurtado y Fontes and Antonio Alonso Gonzalo de Paz Rodríguez de Avilés Coque Marín Blázquez y Baldés.

All these names gave Don Antonio Fontes Paz (third marquis of Torre Pacheco) the right to at least nine mayorazgos that Don Pedro Hurtado, Macías Coque, Diego Riquelme de Avilés, Alonso de Paz, Macías Fontes Carrillo, Juan Damián de la Peraleja, Bernardino, Alejandro Onofre Fontes and Juan Marín Blázquez y Baldés founded (italics by the author).<sup>101</sup> Litigations over rights to ownership were imminent because the founders determined that their successor needed to bear their name, surname and the founder's armas. But the law was loose in that there was no specification as to the incompatibility between the mayorazgo to be founded and those that would end up under one individual. Disputes emerged when one individual accumulated a large amount of properties and the income, the right to property and other economic privileges for other siblings and even other members of the lineage was significantly reduced.

A few examples demonstrate how segundones and other interested parties could have been infuriated after mayorazgos and their privileges did not come their way any more. The decision about the possession of a mayorazgo provided at the Real Chancillería de Granada on 16 October 1731 was favourable to Don Ventura Fontes Paz against Don José Fontes Riquelme. Don

Ventura became legitimate successor of even more mayoralzgos after winning another case against Don Fernando de Melgarejo, knight of San Juan, for the mayoralzgo that Doña Ana de Moya founded in favour of Doña Ana Melgarejo, the spouse of Macías Fontes, first marquis of Torre Pacheco.<sup>102</sup> Within the Riquelme lineage, the most important dispute began after the death of Doña Juana Riquelme. The Riquelme Arroniz Muñoz de Robles were part of the main branch of the lineage and, collaterally, they were connected to the Salafranca name. Both parts competed for the mayoralzgo that Don Cristóbal Riquelme de Arroniz (third lord of Santo Ángel) and his spouse Doña Nofra Riquelme founded, and also for the addition that Don Luis Riquelme made to the mayoralzgo founded by Don Diego Riquelme de Comontes (third lord of Coy) and his spouse Doña Isabel de Bustamante. Following the primogeniture principle, Don Cristóbal Riquelme Muñoz de Robles, son of Don Juan Pedro Muñoz de Robles and Doña María Riquelme, sister of Doña Juana's father, Don Cristóbal Riquelme y Arroniz (fifth lord of Coy and sixth lord of Santo Ángel) received both mayoralzgos after Doña Juana Riquelme died.<sup>103</sup>

Contenders did not always follow what the foundation documents declared, and tensions between parties and families rapidly arose. The addition that Don Luis Riquelme y Avilés (fifth lord of Santo Ángel) made to the mayoralzgo that Don Cristóbal Riquelme y Arroniz and his spouse Doña Nofra Riquelme founded mentioned that only a person with the Riquelme surname could inherit that vínculo to secure perpetual succession. The clauses of Don Diego Riquelme's and Doña Beatriz de Bustamante's mayoralzgo established the same rule, and in another set of clauses it was established that whoever owned the vínculo of Don Diego would not have the Bustamante name. In this case Don Cristóbal Riquelme Muñoz de Robles had to choose one of the mayoralzgos, but he eluded the prerogative and accumulated five mayoralzgos that were named Peñaranda. These included the ones of Don Pedro Muñoz de Robles, Doña Catalina de Musso and Don Juan de Robles (from his father Don Juan Pedro Muñoz de Robles), the one that the licenciado Don Juan de Bustamante and Doña Ginesa de Zamora, parents of Doña Isabel de Bustamante, founded, and the one inherited by Don Gómez de Peñaranda from Doña María Riquelme y Arroniz on his maternal side.<sup>104</sup> This time it was Antonia Riquelme Muñoz de Robles, the daughter of Juan Pedro Muñoz de Robles and Doña María Riquelme y Arroniz, who took his brother Don Cristóbal Riquelme Muñoz de Robles to court, arguing the incompatibility of the last names and the armas of the vínculos.

The decisions of the Real Consejo in 1693 and 1696 favoured Doña Antonia – she was the one that needed to choose between the mayorazgos of the Riquelme, Peñaranda and Bustamante – and her brother Don Cristóbal could retain the Muñoz and Robles ones.<sup>105</sup> However, far from concluding litigations between parties, members of the Riquelme, the Salafranca and the Muñoz de Robles names continued – and also within each of the names – the disputes went on well into the nineteenth century.<sup>106</sup>

Disputes in the collateral parts of the lineage were also constant, and a result of the manoeuvring between different families of the oligarchy. Within the Salafranca section, the Bustamante and the Peñaranda also competed for the Riquelme mayorazgo (see table 4.19, figure 4.25 and 4.26). Antonia Riquelme Muñoz de Robles's second marriage, to Don Antonio de Montoya, made her husband's last name come into the picture. Later, Don Bernardo Riquelme Salafranca went to court and won at the Real Consejo de Castilla in 1709 against Doña María de Montoya and Don Diego Riquelme de Montoya, Doña María's son.<sup>107</sup> The Rocamora family, linked to the Riquelme from the marriage between Doña Juana Riquelme and Don Francisco Rocamora, also came into play. José Antonio Rocamora and, after his death, his son Don José Nicolás Rocamora, disputed mayorazgos with Don Bernardo Salafranca y Riquelme and lost rights to them in different decisions in 1735 and 1739.<sup>108</sup> The more extended the lineage, the more litigations were seen in court.

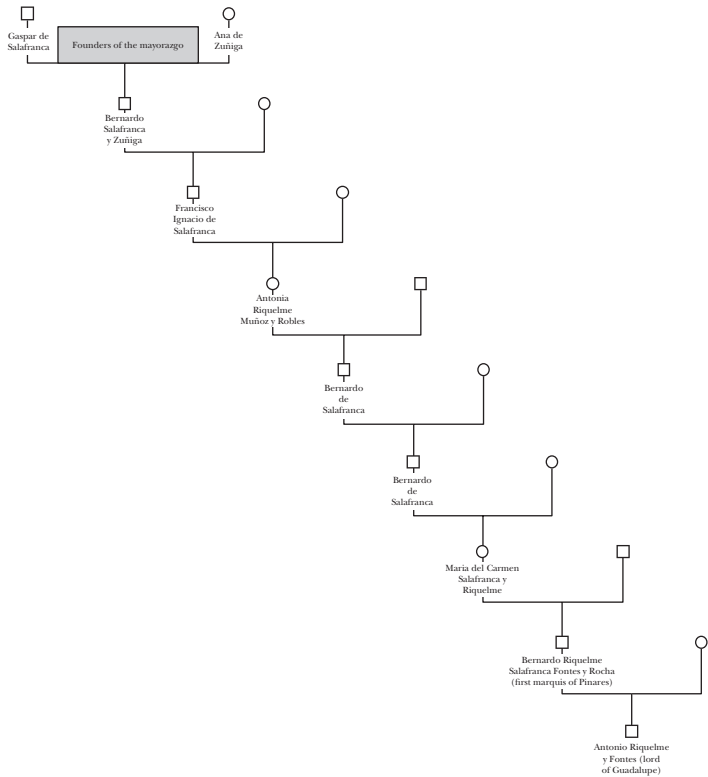

The intricate relations even made some petitions go against the litigant's interests. Such was the case with Don Bernardo Riquelme Salafranca y Rocha (first marquis of Pinares)'s claim when he argued that the Muñoz and Robles mayorazgos were incompatible. He himself owned the mayorazgo that Don Gaspar de Salafranca and his spouse Doña Ana de Zúñiga founded in 1626 (see figure 4.22 and table 4.18), which had a clause that only those with the Salafranca name could inherit the vínculo.<sup>109</sup> In court in 1765 Doña María del Carmen Salafranca y Riquelme (with Don Lino and Don Justo Salafranca) saw her rights confirmed over his brother's, Don Bernardo Riquelme Salafranca y Rocha, though only in terms of income. Don Bernardo had to provide a 200 ducados alimony each year to his sister, but he kept the ownership of the mayoralzgos to be able to pay the required 330 ducados to live at the court as a titulado of Castile.<sup>110</sup> Nevertheless, the litigation did not stop there. In 1728 a Real Cédula banned the hearing of Don Francisco Riquelme Muñoz de Robles's claims against Don Lino Salafranca and Don Bernardo Salafranca y Riquelme, resulting in a favourable ruling for Don Lino in a Real Ejecutoria of 1737.<sup>111</sup> Don Jesualdo Riquelme y Fontes, lord of Guadalupe, continued pursuing rights over Don Bernardo Salafranca Riquelme y Rocha (first marquis of Pinares), and when the latter died in 1779, and Don Jesualdo in 1799, their heirs, Don José Riquelme Salafranca Fontes y Rocha (second marquis of Pinares) and Don Antonio Riquelme Fontes, lord of Guadalupe, followed suit. In 1827 the marquis of Pinares saw his claims affirmed and the mayoralzgos and additions that Don Cristóbal, Nofra, Luis and Diego Riquelme, and Beatriz de Bustamante had founded, as well as the ones from Don Francisco Riquelme Muñoz y Robles, were registered under his name (see figure 4.23 and 4.24).<sup>112</sup>

The abolition of the mayoralzgos and the mandatory dismemberment of lands in the mid-nineteenth century, however, show that the Riquelme never lost control of the mayoralzgos from the Muñoz Robles line. Although the Salafranca name had been victorious in court, after the Ley de Desvinculación de Mayoralzgos of Pascual Madoz in 1841 in Spain, the first of many legal attempts against the concentration of land in the nobility and the clergy in Spain, Don Antonio Riquelme y Fontes was the last owner of the mayoralzgos.<sup>113</sup> By the mid-nineteenth century, Spanish ancien régime institutions were not only incapable and possibly overwhelmed with this type of litigation, but they were also already losing judicial dominance, permitting that though the Salafranca were legally legitimate owners of the land, the Riquelme, Muñoz and Robles benefited from its income.

4.1.2.2. Family Strategies in the First Third of the Nineteenth Century

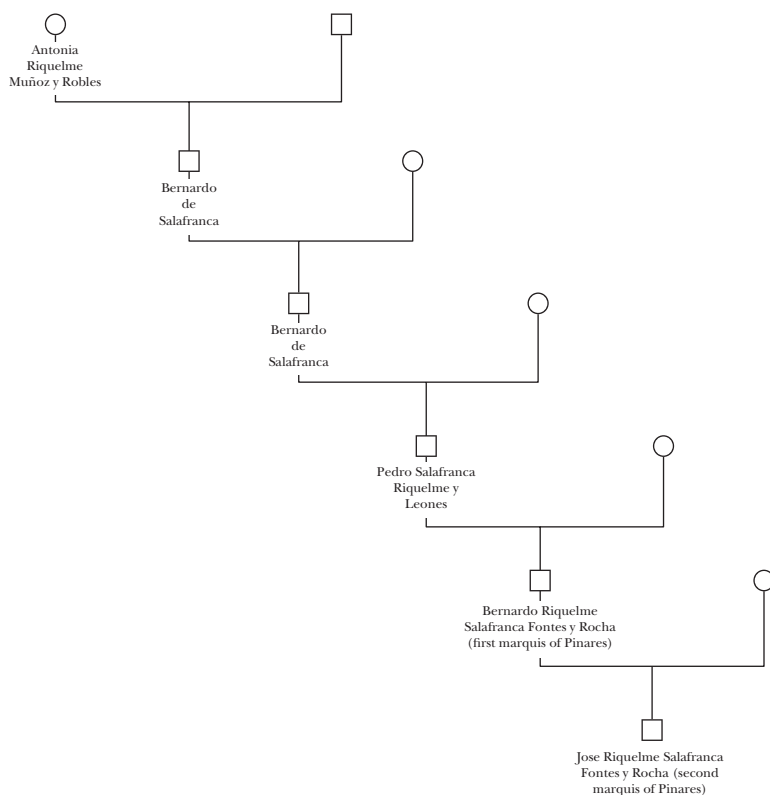

By the beginning of the nineteenth century, the continuous intrafamilial litigation had taken both a political and socioeconomic toll on the Riquelme lineage. The group accumulated such a vast amount of property in Murcia and beyond that maintenance of it all was expensive. The economic profit from the land was draining as a result, and litigations continued to mount because of the incompatibility of combining mayoralzgos. In addition, biological depletion was imminent – an intrinsic consequence of mayoralazgo practices – after decades of following a vertical line of succession and prioritising accumulation in the hands of the first-born. The genealogical trees of the Riquelme lineage show a clear reduction in the number of children by the beginning of the nineteenth century. The lack of heirs was now the problem rather than the segundones.

In the long term, it was one of the factors that explained why mayorazgos remained in the principal line of the Riquelme, and even the section of the Muñoz Robles's ended up under Jesualdo Riquelme y Fontes and his son Antonio Riquelme y Fontes, the last owner of the mayorazgos when the Ley de Desvinculación was enacted in 1841.

The mayorazgo was, in a way, collective suicide, as J. P. Dedieu puts it. It contributed to biological depletion at the end of the eighteenth century.<sup>119</sup> To avoid it, however, the Riquelme followed a new strategy of social enclosing by marrying thriving oligarch families at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The Musso, Sandoval and Zarandona families were an example of the new connections, as well as the marquisate of Corvera of Don Rafael de Bustos y Castilla, who married Doña Teresa Riquelme y Arce, the daughter of Antonio Riquelme y Fontes.<sup>120</sup>

Regardless of the decline, the Riquelme lineage still had a significant socioeconomic status in the Murcian oligarchy (see figure 4.27 and appendix pp. 322–5). The accumulation under Don Antonio Riquelme y Fontes was extraordinary, and also there was no demonstrated separation or abandonment of lands after the Ley de Desvinculación of mayorazgos in Spain. The Riquelme lineage continued to enjoy their properties divided among each family member, with the added value that properties could now be put on the market. After the mid-nineteenth-century legislation, lands could be sold and purchased, or any other means of financial transaction conducted, which contributed to mortgage credit and other incomes and economic benefits. The Riquelme profits did not necessarily decrease, and the properties continued to be transferred within the family – Don Antonio Riquelme y Fontes's will of 1843 distributed the lands among all his children and thus the land remained intact, within the family.<sup>121</sup> The extensive, complex social network of the Riquelme lineage (see table 4.20), based in solidarity and clientelist relations with other families in the Murcian elite, took longer to break up than just passing a couple of laws; it took almost as long to dismantle as it had taken to emerge.<sup>122</sup>

This book has examined the social, political, economic and cultural structures of an ancien régime society in Mediterranean Europe, in the Crown of Castile, through the study of the family. Social stability depends upon the family, both in its diverse forms and in its historical evolution. In early modern Spain, the family was a dynamic institution with marked patterns of behaviour primarily characterised by the head of the family guiding, preserving and guarding family values and protecting new members who became part of the main family group. The family was thus a diverse, social and lively institution, always changing and evolving, adapting and transforming. The scholarly perspective that states the distance between the individual and society can only be studied through the family, and this study takes this viewpoint in full form.<sup>1</sup>

In addition to placing the family as the focal point when analysing a European ancien régime society, a longue durée perspective has also been fundamental throughout the book. By ignoring traditional chronological time frames that limit how deeply historians can explore processes in the medieval and early modern periods, this study provides a long-duration view of the social patterns, actions, dynamics and strategies of a lineage over five centuries. The Riquelme lineage from the kingdom of Murcia is this book's main case study, from their initial settlement in the frontier region of Murcia in 1266 to the first half of the nineteenth century.

In particular, following the different trajectories that the Riquelme lineage travelled towards its consolidation as a prestigious noble family in the myriad institutions and public offices of the concejo between the sixteenth and the eighteenth century offers an ample vision of the social position of the lineage. It is possible to define and explain, much more precisely, the mechanisms and strategies that the lineage chose in order to perpetuate its power and reproduce itself socially. The Riquelme became an integral part of the Murcian oligarchy: they kept evolving and adapting through social and political strategies to new circumstances and social contexts with the aim of permanently staying in different power institutions for long periods of time.

The Riquelme and the family groups close to them settled in Murcia in 1266. They formed part of the military contingents coming from the north of Castile looking for better lands and wealth. After victory against the Muslims in the fifteenth century, the lineage began building its glory in Murcia. To perpetuate their memory and the collective imaginary, the group emblazoned houses with heraldic coats of arms, performed memorial acts and created genealogies. All of this was carried out with the objective of making the public remember, through material and written culture, the glories and achievements of their common predecessor, the founder of the house, a mythical figure that everyone venerated. Once the conquest of the kingdom of Murcia in southern Castile was completed, the lineage settled as knights who took over the land to exploit the irrigated fields and the Murcian orchards. Massive occupation of the land only happened when there was a complete conquest of the Nasrid kingdom of Granada. Before this, Murcia had been a frontier territory often under attack and with its cultivated lands destroyed.

When Alfonso XI's call for reconquest was reactivated, it was the right time for the Riquelme to start consolidating and building their power through war. They were able to adapt to incredibly unstable circumstances and continue establishing themselves through notable achievements in armed conflict and conquest, all in the name of Christendom. The appearance of the Riquelme members in Alfonso XI's military contingent and in the 1374 census of caballeros cuantiosos that John I ordered to be carried out was not in vain. Those that remained as defenders of Christianity and close to the Castilian cause during the reconquest won favours from the monarch after the war and reached positions of power by taking over key high-ranking and prestigious official positions.

The Riquelme also tried to stay under the tutelage and protection of the Fajardo family, already by the fifteenth century the most powerful in the kingdom. Both the Riquelme and the Fajardo held leading positions and public offices, leaving behind old noble families such as the Manuel and causing rising envy from other settled families who had a long tradition in the concejo, which was open up until that moment. Now, as the new noble families forced public offices such as the regidurías to be filled with lifetime positions, the concejo became a closed entity. Lineage disputes and civil war in the kingdom of Murcia in the fourteenth century were a result of these rising tensions and conflicts. The Riquelme's smart political strategy to consolidate their power was twofold: to remain by the Fajardo's side and not to involve the monarch too much in the lineage disputes. All this helped to overthrow the Manuel family and other groups of the old nobility, and, in the process, the role of clientelism, patronage, solidarity and fidelity in social mobility became key. Furthermore, new patterns of social, political and economic interests of emerging families began to arise.

Lineage disputes continued through the early modern period, and they provide essential information for scholars analysing how families regrouped according to social, political and economic interests. The fights between sections were diachronic, dissipating at times and re-emerging later, as evidenced in the conflict between Soto and Riquelme through the long-lasting comunero revolts. The disputes went on even through the eighteenth century, when the union between families from Murcia and Extremadura like Fontes and Paz had the sole goal of exterminating the enemy by the common oral-based baroque society methods of slander and insult.

The Riquelme, once in power, continued to push for more and to consolidate the family among the most powerful groups of Murcia. The juncture that emerged in the last third of the fifteenth century was just what they needed in order to do so. The Riquelme had supported the Catholic monarchs' cause and had also participated in the final conquest of the kingdom of Granada. The family found ways to hold power and achieve great splendour in two locations by holding high office both in the royal court and in Murcia.

Emblems, coats of arms, crests, palaces, portraits, memorials, chapels, burials and altars were all part of the same enterprise to memorialise how the lineage contributed to conquest and also to show their membership of the ethnic group of crisianos viejos. During the early modern period, being part of the Christian conquest, and the consequent demise of Granada's Muslims, was central for the lineage's boastful displays of their past role. It became a guarantee as well when the purity of blood examinations started to be a requirement to access official positions in the concejo, and especially as part of the regidurías, the cabildo eclesiástico, the canonjías and all kinds of prebendas such as hábitos, military orders, familiaturas of the Santo Oficio, mayordomías in the main cofradías, or even as colegial of an illustrious Colegio Mayor.

After conquering Murcia and establishing their social and political power basis in the region, the Riquelme's goal became their economic power consolidation and increase of wealth. The señorío of Santo Ángel had been founded already by the fifteenth century and this group of lands included part of the Murcian Orchard. After the reconquest, they occupied lands in Lorca, which became the señorío of Campo Coy, Caravaca, Cehégín and Bullas in the first half of the sixteenth century, and in the former kingdom of Granada, Baza, Huércal-Overa and Huéscar. Coy and Santo Ángel, the main lines of the Riquelme lineage, were the starting point of an extensive family patrimony that became linked through mayorazgos.

This study has greatly relied on the mayorazgo to track and analyse the consolidation and transformation of the Riquelme as an example of a noble landowning family in a community of Mediterranean Europe. As noted, their first possessions were the mayorazgos of Coy and Santo Ángel, followed by three centuries' accumulation of mayorazgos until 1841, when the Spanish liberal reform Ley de Desvinculación del Mayorazgo was passed. The sources on the mayorazgo and its evolution in the Riquelme case are key to my examination because they provide a starting point (the foundation in the fifteenth century) and the entire process of aggregation, accumulation and circulation that involved all lines of the lineage up to the nineteenth century. The mayorazgo allows for a retrospective analysis of the changes and continuities in the transition from the ancien régime to nineteenth-century political and social liberal societies.

In pre-industrial societies, the mayorazgo was the oligarchy's centre of socioeconomic power. Control over the land, including the water sources and the productive plantations, was the landowners' power currency in a rural and agriculturally based society. And this was especially true in a territory like Murcia, historically dry and no stranger to long periods of drought.

Control of the land became tightly related with control of public offices as well, particularly regidurías that were lifetime positions transmitted through mayorazgos. Within the oligarchy, socioeconomic and political power went hand in hand. This relationship also explains the importance of marriage alliances and strategies as the main mechanism for the lineage's social reproduction and its increase in power in the social, political and economic arenas simultaneously.

The construction of a social network of family bonds was based on a rigorous marriage strategy that allows for a close examination of the social process of accessing and increasing power and wealth in the early modern era. Well-known family names were part of complex processes of upward mobility that are only accessible by following the families' meticulous mechanisms to be connected. The relations that these marriages created were long-term, tight relationships also based on ties of clientelism, fidelity, solidarity and patronage.

The fabric that oligarchic families wove was strong, and by the sixteenth century it began to include not only nobility groups exclusively. The union between the Riquelme family, which was part of the nobility, with family names such as Robles or Muñoz from the Caravaca region, who were part of an emerging social group of traders and artisans, or professionals such as lawyers, secretaries, scribes or from the procuradurías, illustrates this point. The social escalation of these families came from their union with other families as well such as the Dávila or Musso families. Not only emerging families found their way up – there were clear benefits for those in the oligarchy and for their lineages to open up at times. In other circumstances they closed ranks through the bucle matrimonial (marriage turn). The oligarchy changed and adapted over time, though by the end of the early modern period it still was an impermeable social group.

Analysis of the alliances and processes of transformation and change is what allows an understanding of the extension of the Riquelme social network towards the middle layers of society in the eighteenth century. The links to these groups are not only based on consanguinity, specifically those with allegados who held positions as scribes or lawyers, or in the procuradurías or secretarías of the city's Tribunales Ordinarios de Justicia, the Chancillería de Granada or the Consejo de Castilla.

The increase in ownership disputes is what made having good relationships with non-consanguineal individuals important. Mayorazgo-related cases continued to pile up in the Real Chancillería de Granada and in the Consejo de Castilla. Having an inside connection with someone who would support a case was important in receiving a favourable decision. Decisions generally declared one of the litigants the legitimate owner. However, when a desvinculación occurred, it was the opposite side, the party condemned to restore the properties that enjoyed and could make the mayorazgo productive. In the end, although it was not formally declared a principle, the definitive owner of the mayorazgo was the main line of the lineage, the Riquelme Muñoz de Robles. It was a sign of the weakening and stagnation of the basis of the administrative and judicial powers of the ancien régime. The influence and accumulation of positions in the Consejo de Castilla and the Chancillería was overwhelming to the point that the institutions could not handle the number of cases presented. It was a clear sign of an ongoing decline of the administration's capabilities.

The same mayorazgo that fed even more marriage unions among the lineage and the oligarchy was the cause and source of its waning. The persistence of the first-born privileges generated disputes among family members, and especially among the segundones. Endogamy was also practised regularly to avoid wealth dispersal, though this also ended up reducing the number of children, and especially male heirs, thus contributing to the progressive biological stagnation.

In turn, in the first third of the nineteenth century, the Riquelme family reopened to families that were economically and socially emerging such as the Fernández de la Reguera family, one deeply rooted in oligarchic names like Zarandona, Prieto, Sandoval, Musso or Avellaneda. The connections with these families were based both on family and non-family ties – friendship, solidarity, loyalty, living in the same region, and other forms of kinship such as spiritual affinities and joint godfatherhood or compadrazgo. These were some of the mechanisms through which the Riquelme family continued to hold great influence among the elite in the nineteenth century. One space where this is visible is the cofradías. Most of the members of the Cofradía de Santiago de la Espada, for example, located in the city hall, were (noble) regidores. When they celebrated cabildos, they did it as if they were of the concejos. The Cofradía de Santiago de la Espada had its meetings at the city hall where the regidores (almost all also members of the cofradía) had also met. Though the Cofradía de Santiago de la Espada had lost its prominence by the 1810s, the pasionaria Cofradía de Nuestro Padre Jesús Nazareno maintained and took over its status. As in other spaces of power, the shift of positions of some members of prominent families implied that one cofradía would advance in nobility status over time over others. Still, the same pattern of behaviour and exercise of power remained in place.

The connections of the Riquelme family were so diverse and extensive that when the 1841 law to dismantle mayorazgos was passed, most of their properties remained theirs to sell or mortgage. The lineage's socioeconomic and political power hovered over the state's moves towards liberalism, and their influence remained entrenched in the Murcian oligarchy. Spanish liberalism's impact on the oligarchy's behaviour, practice and social mechanisms was not great. This study of centuries of social network building demonstrates that family, clientele, patronage and solidarity relationships among the oligarchy were deeply rooted in society, and that only drastic changes such as civil wars would result in the rupture of clientelism and dependence-based ties. In the nineteenth century, the Riquelme family still held key positions of power through titles such as the marquisesates of Las Almenas and Corvera, the viscounty of Rías, and the marquisesates of Salinas, Ordoño and Beniel.

Legislation for political change followed a different and often parallel path to the social, economic and political interests on which the permanence of the institutions was sustained. Medieval and ancien régime structures in Spain were long-lasting, and some prevailed over any drastic change of the social system, even in the nineteenth century. The oligarchy's and elite's social actors' resistance to nineteenth- and even twentieth-century efforts to implement social and economic change was evident, and thus their influence and power, and also certain social practices from the medieval period and the ancien régime, persisted. Change occurred slowly as social relationships and connections endured over time.

- 155 As has been mentioned before, the marquisate of Pinares was granted to Bernardo Riquelme y Salafranca in 1763 due to the policy of favours that was established between the Molina family and the Riquelme Salafranca. Cardinal Molina, president of the Consejo de Castilla between 1733 and 1744, favoured the aforesaid family as his niece, María Antonia Rocha, was married to Bernardo Riquelme y Salafranca. As the granting of corregimientos was the Cardinal's prerogative, in his capacity of president of the Consejo de Castilla, in December 1739 he appointed Bernardo Riquelme y Salafranca corregidor of Alcalá la Real, Loja and Alhama. The same cardinal might have been the one to grant him, in 1744, a seat as consejero super-numerario of Hacienda. He favoured Justo Riquelme in his military career. He served first as guardamarina (1741) and later as navy lieutenant (1757). Thanks to these family ties and favours he received the nobiliary title of marquis of Pinares. We must make clear that both of his surnames, Molina and Rocha, helped him greatly in obtaining these favours. The name Rocha was of great importance, and with one of his seats in Merida, was tied to this family. Therefore we highlight two notorious characters related to the Riquelme Salafrañca family: Don Fernando Antonio de la Rocha y Guillasmas, regidor of Mérida, who served in a corregimiento in Écija; and the previously mentioned Molina, father to María Antonia de Rocha, Juan de Molina, was corregidor of Granada; her brother, Juan de Molina, was marquis of Ureña; and the first cousin of the previously mentioned María Antonia, Gaspar de Molina, was bishop of Almería. AHN, Secc. Inq.; 1788, L. 1405, No. 13. F; Andújar Castillo, El sonido del dinero, pp. 177, 179, 180, 182, 213. The title of marquis of Torre Pacheco would be inserted in the so-called títulos blancos (that is, titles granted by the crown, with no particular beneficiary), to a specific institution so that this institution would be able to sell it and collect money for it. Therefore, the aforesaid title was bought in 1690 by Don Macías Fontes Carrillo, and it had been granted by the crown to the cathedral's cabildo so that the cabildo could use the funds obtained from the sale as means to subsidise the expenses of the sacristy or Murcia's cathedral, which was burned down in 1689. 'Persuasive, convincing and complex, Blood, Land and Power focuses on the journey of the Murcian Riquelme family between the thirteenth and eighteenth centuries, and offers an exciting insight into the multiple dimensions required for the longue durée survival of the noble elites in southern Europe. Placing family dynamics at the centre of the analysis, Manuel Perez-Garcia explores analytical categories such as lineage, purity of blood, honour, social networks and mayorazgo. The talent and art revealed in the treatment of historical sources transform this attractive case study into a general model for understanding the multilayered Spanish nobilities.'

Professor Mafalda Soares da Cunha, University of Évora

The analysis of land management, lineage and family through the case study of early modern Spanish nobility from sixteenth to early nineteenth century is a major issue in recent historiography. It aims to shed light on how upper social classes arranged strategies to maintain their political and economic status. Rivalry and disputes between old factions and families were attached to the control and exercise of power. Blood, land management and honour were the main elements in these disputes. Honour, service to the Crown, participation in the conquest and 'pure' blood (Catholic affiliation) were the main features of Spanish nobility. This book analyses the origins of the entailed-estate (mayorazgo) from medieval times to early modern period, as the main element that enables us to understand the socio-economic behaviour of these families over generations. This longue durée chronology within the Braudelian methodology of the research aims to show how strategies and family networks changed over time, demonstrating a micro-history study of daily life.

MANUEL PEREZ-GARCIA is tenured Associate Professor in the Department of History, School of Humanities, at Shanghai Jiao Tong University in China, and is founder and director of the Global History Network in China (GHN). He is Principal Investigator of the Global Encounters between China and Europe (GECHEM) Project, funded by the European Research Council under the European Union's Horizon 2020 Research and Innovation Programme.
